The shadow chancellor says he is not in favour of Labour's leader, Jeremy Corbyn, but he doesn't think the Labour party should oppose him. Nor, it seems, does he support the speaker, John Bercow. "No," he says, after I ask the question. "John, John, John. He doesn't belong in the House. He doesn't belong in the Labour party." I ask again. "Jeremy Corbyn?" "I would not say no," he says, more ponderously. But even if, for example, Corbyn was the Labour party's leader, he would have no problem with Bercow. Indeed, he would hope he would allow him to keep the job. "I think the speaker should have no influence on who wins the leadership elections. I think he has a very weak voice in the Labour party, very, very, very weak." The reason? "He is not the voice of the Labour party. He is not the voice of the Labour movement. He is in the House of Lords." Bercow – the holder of the single most powerful position in the House of Commons – comes to represent the Labour party. "So, he should be in the Labour party?" I ask. "Oh no, he should be in the House of Lords." Given that many are now calling for Bercow to be sacked, I ask why he has lasted so long. "Because you are allowed to be biased," he answers. "Even if you are saying the Labour party should ignore the Labour party 520fdb1ae7
