This kind of gets into the Supersayan-problem of increasingly powerful enemies who can only be defeated by the main character after it gets stronger, but it varies enough (more so in the second season than the first). Despite the characters feeling all the place in the first few episodes, there's a point in that and after two seasons I actually really like how the character arc turned out. Suffering, hatred, love, friendship, humanity is one of the pillars of this anime. It's not great either you can see some great fight as well. This is a phycological thriller to be but ending a little out of context with a lesser explanation explanation to make a place for a second season and be clear after this season no ghoulish can impress me can be a ghoulish just cruel. Tokyo Ghoulish is simultaneously a violent show with big action scenes and the study of a philosophical character. If you're reading this, you've probably stumbled upon some pieces of information about anime, and you're curious if its worth it. Kaneki and Heih reunite, and they double the time they spend together. Kaneki and Tuka remember the other members of Anteater separately, as both they and CCG cope with their losses.
