Nuclear respiratory factor 1 (NRF1) is a stress-inducible transcription factor that promotes the expression of genes important for oxidative metabolism, mitochondrial function and cellular proliferation. Although NRF1 has been recently shown to regulate metabolic reprogramming in breast cancer cells, its role in breast cancer cells remains unknown. Here we demonstrate that NRF1 is essential for the Warburg effect in human breast cancer cells. Knockdown of NRF1 in breast cancer cells led to a reduction of cell proliferation, and a decrease in ATP production, and lactate secretion. NRF1 silencing also suppressed aerobic glycolysis, as measured by the reduction of extracellular acidification rate, glucose consumption, lactate production and the expression of glycolytic enzymes. Furthermore, NRF1 silencing decreased the expression of lactate dehydrogenase A and aspartate aminotransferase in breast cancer cells. In addition, NRF1 silencing impaired the growth of tumorspheres derived from the breast cancer cells. Finally, analysis of gene expression microarray data in human breast cancer samples revealed that the genes, which were suppressed by NRF1 silencing, were significantly enriched in metabolic genes. These findings support the importance of NRF1 as a regulator of the Warburg effect and may provide a novel target for therapeutic intervention of human breast cancer.For an undiscovered author who is a little older than most, my story-telling art is improving to a level that is never far short of inspiring. Each new work brings a new high. A name in the dust of other "unknown" authors could be "Gunny R." My YouTube channel is where all the above ideas are shared with the world. The first video is about 1.000 views at the time of writing this, and the one with 2.000 views will be added later this week. New videos, one or two a month 520fdb1ae7
