@JusticeDeborahCarruth has presided over the great work of the McCarran-Ferguson Act, ensuring competition and preserving the role of the free market in health care. #PAGA #2A pic.twitter.com/DYm3xh3GKl — Rep. Bill Shuster (@repbillshuster) May 15, 2018 The heart of the legislation, the CHOICE Act, provides Americans with a tax-free gift of about $4,600 per year for primary care — $1,200 for adults and $2,400 for children under 18 — that are put in a health savings account (HSA). In the near future, the average HSA can be expected to grow to $12,500 in annual contributions and $3,000 in deductions. The money can be used for almost any health care good or service, except drugs and tobacco. Each dollar you give to a health savings account is a dollar that is yours, not the government's. It's a wonderful thing. ... Today, it is the leading health care reform proposal in Congress. The legislation, which would also expand insurance for illegal aliens and establish a new federal commission that would determine whether Americans have adequate insurance, was first introduced by Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX). Other leading conservatives have endorsed it, including Sen. Ben Sasse (R-NE) and the Heritage Foundation. The proposal is expected to face opposition from the so-called moderates in the Republican Party, who have stood in the way of repeal of Obamacare. But these "reformers" have no problem handing power to big business, and they've been insistent in the past that Americans are too stupid to handle health care decisions for themselves. The left has railed against the idea of individual health care and opposed various attempts to expand health care access and lower health care costs for lower-income people. They have opposed the idea of health savings accounts and have suggested that people should just buy insurance from the government. As for the costs, they're bogus. "The Congressional Budget Office has projected that 10 million people would become newly insured under the current proposal," AARP pointed out. "The estimated savings on administrative costs would be nearly $800 billion over a decade." It's worth noting that the tax deduction for an HSA can be greater than the premiums that are being paid to insurance companies. And people will no longer be limited to contributing 520fdb1ae7
