Reading time: 6 minutes Pigeons adapt, hardy and agile. And while the types of pigeons vary in size and function, all pigeons have similar requirements to. Knowing what to feed pigeons and the perfect pigeon loft design will allow you to ensure a healthy herd. Pigeon Loft Design Across the Board, rule the thumb when setting up and keeping the pigeon loft to keep the loft very dry with plenty of ventilation. Philip Spatola of Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, recently received the American Pigeon Racing Union's Loft of the Year award. Members were invited to submit photographs and descriptions of their attics. Not only was it an online loft beauty contest, but it also illustrates the variety of performances that provide healthy shelter for homing pigeons. Styles and sizes were passed on to a wide range of skills and tools. I contacted a local shed company to build a shed to my specifications and then had a friend install the partitions and perches inside the attic, spatola said. Phil Spatola's award-winning loft. Having a loft elevated from the ground helps the circulation of the air and keeps it dry. He cleans his Cary'd Away Loft once a day in the morning and then feeds and water birds. In the summer, he cleans the attic twice a day. Fans and electricity were installed to help with ventilation and amenities. Deone Roberts, sports development manager for the American Pigeon Racing Union, says the well-designed loft consists of flooring, four walls, roof, external fixtures (landing board, trap, fans and turbines, and enclosures), internal fixtures, a warehouse for food and other supplies plus an infirmary. The loft should prevent pests, including air predators. The neat appearance and mixing around is most useful for promoting good relationships Roberts said. And remember, The cost of construction has no effect on racing success. The size of the attic should be 8 to 10 cubic feet of airspace per bird. A well-made loft will include at least three partitions: one for breeders, one for young birds, and one for older birds. To make it comfortable for yourself and help with cleaning, the ceiling should be high enough for you to stand upright. Having the loft elevated from the ground will help circulate the air and keep it dry. Spatola's Cary'd Away Loft includes different partitions for a variety of older birds. The roof should be sloping from front to back to allow rain to roll off the board. The landing board should be large enough for all birds to land at one time. The trap functions so that pigeons that fly out into the street can return to the attic, but will not be able to fly out again. It should be in the center of the board. The traps can be purchased for about $20. My father and I built a trap out of wire coat hangers when I flew glasses and racing pigeons, and it worked great. Roberts says that enclosures are an integral part of any well-designed loft allowing birds to have a constant supply of fresh air and sun. Each section of the loft should have a small aviary where birds can go out in the sun and rain, said Frank McLaughlin. It's also nice to be able to close these enclosures to keep the weather inside the attic. McLaughlin of McLaughlin Lofts has been raising pigeons for 43 years. Most of the best lofts have air entering low and leaving the loft at a high point causing a chimney effect, he said. Many amateurs keep their pigeons on grated floors, and some use deep debris, which I prefer a thin layer of wood pellets used in wood-burning stoves. Humidity is the worst condition for pigeons so having sunlight enter the attic is excellent to keep dry, McLaughlin said. Pigeons rarely, if ever get sick, if they have space, dryness, good food, minerals/cereals, and pure fresh water. A beautifully designed attic. Photo courtesy of Vernon Young. Each pair of pigeons must have its own nest box. Boxes don't have to be complicated. Boxes that are 18 inches long and 12 inches tall and wide are suitable for most rocks. Having a small lip at the front will keep nesting materials, eggs and squabs safe. Placing a small clay flower pot or bowl, along with nested materials such as hay, straw, needles, wood chips or twigs will help with the breeding cycle. Perches throughout the attic and enclosure can be built from one by four inch board, tree branches, or ponchaima dowel. While pigeons are very sociable, another fact of pigeons is that they can be territorial. Having enough perch is important to reduce the quarrel. What do pigeons eat? Commercial cereals and seeds readily available in farmers' shops and decide what pigeons eat. Protein is important for pigeons, pigeons, Production. Peas and soybeans are excellent sources of protein. What pigeons eat depends on the level of activity of birds. Different compositions are made for birds that breed, raising the young, mooring, or racing. To have good hygiene in the attic, place the lids on all containers of food and water. Photo Spatola Some of the first foods that poultry eat include green, maple, and yellow peas, mung beans and lentils. To ensure that your birds receive the nutritional value that is advertised on the packaging, birds should eat the full range of grains. If they give too many seeds, they will choose their favorite ones. Offering only the amount of food pigeons will consume in one day, you will make sure that they eat a nutritious variety of bag touts. To create your own pigeon food, check out this basic formula. DIY Pigeon Formula Corn 40% Red Wheat 27% Peas 18% Kefir (sorghum) 15% Mineral Sand Free Scoop Choice at Dove Poop Ten thousand years ago, agriculture is developing in Iran. The transition from short-term profit to profitability has begun. Farmers needed a way to change the soil after their crops destroyed the fertility of the soil. Pigeon towers, or dovecotes, have become an essential part of the agricultural economy, providing fertilizer for crops such as melons and cucumbers that require a lot of nitrogen. Wild pigeons will live in these towers that have been strategically placed in the fields, and educators will collect manure once a year to sell to other farmers. Pigeon manure was considered so valuable that guards were placed on dovecotes to keep thieves from stealing wild bird droppings! At another time in history, pigeon droppings were used as a component of gunpowder. Dr Ayhan Bekleyen of Dikla University, Diyarbakir, Turkey, shared this dovecote from eastern Turkey. A relic of a dovecote located in Diyarbakir, Turkey. Photo courtesy of Dr. Ayhan Bekleyen. Clean in nest boxes and lofts are essential to prevent manure buildup, minimize moisture, and maintain a healthy environment that reduces the likelihood of disease. Placing an inch of sand on the attic floor will help in cleaning the attic. You can easily sift through the sand and remove the debris. Daily sand raking will keep the sand clean and dry. By adding a little dirt and organic matter like grass clipping manure, it will compost down, making its own valuable pigeon pee fertilizer. This high nitrogen fertilizer works well on tomatoes, eggplants, melons, roses and other plants that are good in rich soil.
