However, the tools currently used to evaluate treatment in transgender health services are limited mainly by focusing on mental health or because they have been developed only for binary transgender people. The study was therefore aimed at developing and testing a tool that removes these limitations. The Gender Congruence and Life Satisfaction Scale (GCLS) was developed by reviewing literature, interviewing transgender people and holding discussions with transgender health experts. The original product pool was developed and feedback was received. The tool was then tested. Method: A total of 789 participants (451 transgender (171 transgender women) were recruited to test the tool, 147 transgender men, 133 non-binary identifying men) and 338 cisgender (254 women, 84 men) from the United Kingdom to test the structure of factors and validity of GCLS. It has been found that these seven subscales have good internal coherence and converged confidence. GCLS provide transgender and cisgender subscale norms for GCLS, so for research purposes.
