Spartanburg day school summer camp

Dog days in summer, those late July and August days that please us in the fall, came and went again. But what does dog days actually mean? Well, we're glad you asked! Unfortunately, the answer has nothing to do with gold retrievers lying by the pool, wearing sunglasses and sipping dog-friendly mojitos to stay cool. This is a tragedy - the golden retrievers are so cute - but the answer is still pretty elegant. This is called a helioccal uprising. Contrary to popular belief, dog days in summer have nothing to do with the weather or temperature. They just usually happen to fall on the hottest days of the year - although many of our hottest days occur after August 11, causing many to incorrectly identify dog days as the final weeks of summer. Friends, that's just not true! In fact, right now, dog days are over. It's that blessed time of year when Florence and the machine is right. And if it's still really fucking hot, you can calm down with thoughts of puppies by the pool until autumn finally comes. Just don't blame Sirius! It's the best feeling in the world. Actually, what's even cooler is that Alyssa asked me to sit down for her. My name is Mike, this guy Alyssa calls nervous English teacher (EET). I dated Alyssa briefly, and I even blogged several times. I'm fresh from a year-long rocky relationship and since you've always given Alyssa great advice I hope you can do the same for me. A little backstory: The other day I blogged here, I mentioned that my girlfriend might be leaving me soon. Well, when she found out that I was even considering writing a love-life blog, she eventually did. Our chemistry was explosive. It was a high-stakes, no-limit, crazy-bedroom-boot-knocking kind of that anyone would love. But sexual chemistry can only get you this far. Eventually you have to leave the bedroom. Simply put, we are in different places. She completes an internship and becomes a psychologist. Her friends and family (whom I haven't even met) think she should be trying to settle down. Everyone thinks I'm too nervous and that it would only be a matter of time before we broke him. I almost regret letting us get this far. Even though I thought I loved her, the relationship wasn't strong enough. And if something is not the perfect fit then, well, make a change. School is for the summer, and so surely is my relationship. Let the change begin. So here's my question to you: polls – Take Our Poll Is summer camp safe during a pandemic? Here are the factors to consider before answering this question for your family. Share on PinterestCampfires. Canoeing. Crafts. You and your children had an idea of what this summer would last, and I bet it doesn't involve a pandemic. You may have had to cancel your summer camp plans, along with so many other activities. But with lockdowns easing, camp could be an option again and your kids want to go. So the question is: Is it safe? Short answer? It matters. Margaret Aldrich, MD is a pediatric infectious disease specialist at Children's Hospital in Montefiore, New York. There is no zero risk of activity, he says. Families have to make decisions that work for them and for their child. The coronavirus situation is different in every state and even in the county. Aldrich advises that your first step should be to check local case numbers and whether they are growing in your area. The local health department will have up-to-date guidance on what is allowed and recommended. Circumstances change all the time, so parents should educate them on it in real time, says Aldrich. For families living in states where they are starting to see higher rates of infection, families should think about the need to draw back from communal settings, he adds. Some states may not be allowing camps to take place at all, so the decision could be out of your hands. If your chosen camp works this summer, it could be a low risk and fun experience for your child if certain conditions are met. Before you drop off your children in summer camp, you do not usually ask administrators questions such as What is your disinfection policy? but these are not normal times. You want to make sure that the environment you're sending your child to is as safe as possible. Aldrich suggests looking at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) guidelines for camp administrators as a challenge to the questions you should ask and the information you should expect you to get. The camp should share clear policies: As Aldrich pointed out, nothing is without risk, but you can make decisions that minimize your child's chance of exposure to the coronavirus. Camp administrators should assure you that they have plans in place to reduce the risk of infection. For example, if it's preventable, children shouldn't share devices. Camps should be choosing games that don't involve passing objects around. For arts and crafts, your child should have their own packaging tools and materials to use each time. If the device really can not be disinfected between each child, then they should at least wash their hands thoroughly before the activity. The lowest risk situation is a day camp where there are 10 children in a group, it's the same group of children every day, they all come from the same town or village, and the camp takes place outdoors with activities that allow for some spatial distance between the children, explains Aldrich. Day camps are also more likely to operate this summer than their residential counterparts. However, if the residential camp is in a rural setting with minimal movement to and from the place throughout the stay, it will basically become a big one pod. As Aldrich points out, you don't have day-to-day exposure to a city bus or camp bus where many kids are still on to go to camp every day, and then return to a separate environment every night. The act of swimming itself is quite safe. Camp pool chlorination kills the virus, according to Aldrich. However, we have all seen children having fun in the water; distancing can go directly out the window. Water activities could best be left to older children who are more able to manage their own space, or in the form of kayaking, where the boat itself ensures that the children are spread out. One measure against the coronavirus is a definite no-no in the pool: wearing masks. If soaked, it's rendered not functional, says Aldrich, and it could also be a danger to users. Some activities will be safer choices than others. Camp administrators will likely avoid contact sports like football, as children can't keep apart and will physically develop themselves too much to comfortably wear a mask. Aldrich suggests something like tennis or softball as an alternative because you're spatially separated, but you're playing and interacting. Like any local area has a unique situation, so does each family. Do you know your the best and can decide if your chosen camp has assured you that it can provide a safe environment for your child. You also know how sensitive and responsible they are and whether they can follow safety and hygiene procedures. If your child has special medical needs, Aldrich recommends discussing the camp with your pediatrician. They know your child well and will also be well informed about local infection rates. And even if your child doesn't have any specific health issues, if you have any questions about sending them to camp, your pediatrician would be a good go-to professional to answer them. Hopefully, you've already talked to your children about the pandemic, hearing their concerns and reinforcing behaviors like physical distancing and hand washing. If they are on their way to camp this year, Aldrich also advises discussing what experiences they might be like - especially if children are returning to a place they have already left. Before they get there, they should understand that the camp they know and love will be a little different. Once you have all the information about infection control measures from camp administrators, you will be able to explain to your child exactly what to expect. For many children who have been quarantined for months and haven't been in the standard classroom experience, summer camp is a really great opportunity for them to socialize again, even if it's not quite the same as they were in the past, says Aldrich. Your children could still have a nice camp experience this year. If your local health department allows this and staff are taking the right measures to reduce the risk of infection, summer camp could still be an option for your family. You know your child best and can assess how well they cope with the modified experience and be able to handle new hygiene procedures. Of course, if you thought you felt too anxious, you don't feel pressure to send your children to camp. Create a fun summer at home. They can always form some of those rare camp memories for next year. Molly Scanlan is a freelance writer based in London. She is passionate about feminist parenting, education and mental health.
