You can count on us to again help students understand the powers of the presidency and what it means to have a successful first 100 days. These justified and newly created resources are interesting, engaging and designed to enable students to analyze events such as the State of the Union address and to tackle important issues related to communications, campaign promises, cabinet nominations, and domestic and foreign policy. We hope you have as much fun using them as we had to make them! The first 100 days even presidents have to worry about making the grade! Discover the story behind First 100 Days and its impact on the US presidency with this new lesson plan that includes expansion ideas and media literacy moments. Presidential agenda For the winning candidate, campaign promises evolve into an official presidential agenda. And despite the dubious general public, 75% of agenda goals since Woodrow Wilson have been delivered. This mini-lesson takes a look at how the president's agenda is being developed, shared and executed. Cabinet building The president is not alone when it comes to the daily work of the executive branch. This lesson takes a look at the history of the presidential cabinet, how the government is built through the confirmation process, and why this elite group of people matters to you. Supreme Court nominations Supreme Court justices keep their jobs for life, so when it comes time for a new justice to join the ranks, all eyes are on the president and Congress. This lesson introduces the basics of Supreme Court Justice nominations, helping students cut through policies to compare the nominees' legal philosophies and make their own judgments.
