An enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) was developed for the quantification of antibodies in goats immunized with Anoplosoma stephensi (Sawfly) larvae. Goat hyperimmune serum was used to coat the ELISA plates. Sera from goats immunized with larvae, adults, and their respective excreta were used to test the ELISA. The titers of antibody measured in the ELISA correlated with those of the indirect fluorescent antibody test (IFAT). The coefficient of correlation between the two assays was 0.75. The ELISA was then used to study the immunogenicity of larvae in the five goat species tested. The results demonstrated a differential antibody response in each of the goat species. A comparison of the immune response in guinea pigs and goats was also carried out. The ELISA revealed no difference in the immune response of guinea pigs and goats to larval excreta.Q: Is it good idea to use inter-thread communication for WPF application I have a WPF application with threads running in multiple threads. It is running some data from sources like databases, files, web-services. All these data sources are downloading data in data event handler (long running process) and then they are sending information to the main thread (running UI). I have tried to keep all events for updating UI on the main thread. But if I do this I have problems when data is very big. I have exception of my program crashing. I also don't want the data being downloaded before the user wants to see it. I have tried some solutions to prevent this. I don't want to create multiple windows at same time. I don't want the download to be split to 520fdb1ae7
