In a blistering attack on Mrs May, the Labour leader said it was "dire" and a "disaster". Speaking in Leeds, he said: "May's Brexit is a disaster for jobs, a disaster for living standards, a disaster for the NHS, a disaster for peace, a disaster for communities and a disaster for Britain." But he pledged Labour's "Brexit plan for jobs and living standards will ensure Britain leaves the single market and the Customs Union". (Image: REUTERS) (Image: PA) The leader then spelled out Labour's plan for Britain after Brexit in a speech which took aim at some of the government's flagship policies. He said Labour will introduce a land value tax to "fund an ambitious programme of public investment, to get everyone in work and to help working families pay their way". And he pledged that "If the Tories continue on this path, they will find they have a divided country and a divided Parliament." He said: "Under a Labour government, we will legislate to guarantee a jobs and homes guarantee, to protect our hardworking public servants and to strengthen the social security safety net. "We will strengthen the NHS, ensure the poorest and most vulnerable are protected and increase funding to improve schools, hospitals and the care of our elderly." The speech was delivered in Keighley, one of the towns which voted to leave the EU in last year's referendum. (Image: SWNS.com) Despite saying there are "no magic wands" to fix the housing crisis, Corbyn listed seven steps to tackle the issue. He said he would create more affordable housing by providing "investment in affordable housing, encouraging Councils and the private sector to build more, making private sector building more affordable for social landlords and building new housing using prefabricated building components to produce more and more council housing". He pledged to create 100,000 more council homes
