It has a tangent for the children's book series series Unfortunate Events, and was published shortly before the thirteenth and final installment. According to the cover, the book is suspiciously related to the Book of Thirteen, although the British edition simply states that it contains the key to the Book of Thirteen. The book consists of thirteen letters, six from Beatrice Baudelaire II to Lemony Snicket, six from Lemony Snicket beatrice Baudelaire, and one from Lemony Snicket to its editor (one of them appears in each book in the main series, but this is the first time such a letter has been included in the plot). However, the two Beatrice, despite the exchange of the name, are clearly individuals, and while the letters of Lemonic Snicket are clearly written, starting from childhood and ending shortly before the birth of Violet Baudelaire, Beatrice writing to Snicket apparently write after the events of the end. The eldest Beatrice is one mentioned throughout the series of unfortunate events by Lemona Snicket as his deceased love, and her personality as the mother of Baudelaire's children from the series is revealed in Beatrice Letters, but the identity of the younger Beatrice is not directly explained, other than the statement that she also has some connection with Violet , Klaus, and Sunny (although at the end it turned out that she is Kit's daughter Snicket). Keith's daughter later finds herself raised by Baudelaire's orphans. The book contains twelve percussion letters (from the alphabet, as opposed to correspondence, although ambiguity is intentional), and each of them is mentioned in different, interesting ways. An example is that the first letter E, matched with a map from Snicket to Beatrice, in which the Snicket card painted the shapes of E. Cardstock letters may seem like an anagram of Beatrice Sank, Beatrice the time boat in the book End and Snicket Brae, as it was said that Lemony Snicket lived in the mountains for some time. The book also includes a poster of what appears to be the wreckage of Beatrice, along cave, Klaus glasses, Violet's hair ribbon and Sunny's cookbooks. Kidsreads.com praised Beatrice Letters, claiming Snicket includes what may, amazingly, be one of the most touching and sincere (if absurd) love letters ever written... This raises the stakes, and the expectation, for Snicket was looking forward to the Book of Thirteen. In 2006, more than 350,000 copies of the book were sold in the United States. Extracted from series of unfortunate events' series finale is similar to the book, but has a few changes that make it more uniquely happy. The thirteenth and final novel in the main series is also called The End, and also ends with an epilogue a year after the birth of Beatrice II, in which Baudelaire's children decided to sail off the island. Baby Beatrice sees the name on the boat and says her first word - and it's like a big twist about Beatrice being The Bodeler's mother revealed. She looked at the sign, and her forehead was wrinkled in concentration. Finally, she uttered the word. Baudelaire's orphans ailed when they heard it, but they couldn't tell if she had read the word out loud or just pronouncing her name, and they never found out. Perhaps this last word was the child's first secret, joining the secrets the Baudelaires kept from the child, and all the other secrets immersed in the world. Perhaps it is better not to know exactly what was meant by this word, as some things are better left in the great unknown. There are some words, of course, that are better left unspoken, but not, I believe, a word uttered by my niece, a word that here means that the story is over. Beatrice. The end doesn't end with Beatrice II telling Lemony Snicket the next chapter of Baudelaire's story, but it (sort of) takes place in the tie-in book Beatrice Letters, in which ten-year-old Beatrice II writes letters to Lemony Snicket and reveals that she was brought up by a baby bodler. She also says she was separated from them at some point and is now trying to find out what happened to them. The books never reveal who Beatrice II's father is, while the TV show makes it clear that her father Dewey is the denouement. The biggest difference between a TV show and a book is the fate of quagmire, Fiona, and Fernald. In the TV show we see, quigli kouagmire is reunited with his brother and sister in their balloon-powered home and we see Fiona and Fernald getting disaster from their stepfather, Captain Widdershin, whom they were looking for. In the books, Keith Snicket meets Fiona, Fernald and Captain Widdershins (who is present in the books, not missing) aboard Kikeg. Kuigli reunites with his siblings, but soon after, the eagles manage to jump out onto a self-propelled balloon that falls into the sea and crashes into the Kvikg, destroying it. Keith manages to make a raft of books that takes her to the island, but Fernald, Fiona, Captain Widdershin and kouagmire are all absorbed by the Great Unknown. It is not known if they died or if they were just somewhere else. As mentioned earlier, The Great Unknown is a metaphor for unanswered questions, one of which is the fate of The Baudelaire's friends. Speaking of unanswered questions, the book never actually reveals what's inside the sugar bowl. There are a few hints dropped, and the popular theory among fans is that the sugar bowl contains an antidote to Medusoid mycelium, but it's never made explicit as it is in a TV show. The significance of the series of unfortunate events ' Ending from the title forward, a series of unfortunate events is presented as a tragedy - filled with suffering and misfortune and villains winning the day and good people dying terribly. In many ways, it's simple. However, our point of view is distorted by the fact that the story is told by Lemony Snicket, who doesn't really know how it ends. Lemony survived the V.F.D. split and lost his brother, sister and the love of his life - not to mention many of his friends. No wonder he has such a gloomy look. Because the final chapter of the series of Unfortunate Events is not said by Lemony Snicket, the series can have a happy ending - and it is absolutely important for the theme of all three seasons. The series of unfortunate events is not really about the unfortunate events that occur, but about the willingness of the Baudelaires to persevere in the face of those sad events. Like the viewer, the Baudelaires are constantly confronted with people telling them they should simply give up - whether Olaf gloating about his short-lived victories, Mr. Po tells the children to put themselves back in his care, Judge Strauss asking them to come and live with her so she can keep them safe, or Ishmael telling them to drink heartfelt and forget their troubles. In Lemony's books, Snicket encourages the reader to read a conflict-free book about a happy little elf, and in the series he repeatedly tells viewers to stop watching. Even the show's theme song begs the audience to step aside. Like the viewer, the Baudelaires decided to keep going in the face of this constant frustration, choosing a difficult, dangerous and often frustrating path instead of going the easy way In The End, once their perseverance has been rewarded with asylum and answers to their questions about their parents, they wonder if they should stay on the island, but Violet says they can't shelter Beatrice's baby forever. Like their parents once, they set off on a new journey - one that is likely to throw them into even more sad events (Beatrice II mentions that they encountered pirates on their way back to Brinkey Beach), but could also eventually lead them to the best. The final scene between Beatrice II and Lemony Snicket represents this shift in perspective. While Lemony was once fixated on losing his Beatrice, he now sees the potential that the future has in Beatrice II. The book consists of thirteen letters, six from Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire, six from Beatrice Baudelaire II to Lemony Snicket, and one from Lemonia to its editor. (A letter to the editor appears in each book of the main series, but this is the first time such a letter has been included in the plot of one of the books.) While Lemonic Snicket's letters are clearly written, from childhood to life shortly before the birth of Violet Baudelaire, Beatrice, who writes to Snicket, appears to be writing after The End. The eldest Beatrice is one mentioned throughout the series of unfortunate events of Snicket as his deceased love, and her personality as the mother of Baudelaire's children from the series is revealed in Beatrice Letters, but the identity of the younger Beatrice is not directly explained, except for the statement that she also has some connection with Violet, Klaus , and Sunny. (At the end it turned out that she is the daughter of Kit Snicket.) It is interesting to note that the front cover contains two faces, one hidden in the hair of the other. The book contains twelve percussion letters (from the alphabet, as opposed to correspondence, although ambiguity is intentional), and each of them is mentioned in different, interesting ways. An example is that the first letter E is matched with a card from Snicket to Beatrice, in which the Snicket card drew the forms of E. The beat from the cardstock letter appears to be an anagram of Beatrice Sank, but they can also be organized spell Of Bray Snicket, and Bear Snicket. Letters (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #1) The first letter was sent on one of Lemonic Snicket's personal cards, and written during his third period of the V.F.D. class. In the postcard, which was delivered to Beatrice, he apologised for embarrassing her to friends and invited her to a good cafe nearby that serves great corn beer floats. He was eleven years old when he wrote a message on the card, which he marked on the map himself. The card is marked as Lemny Snicket, a student of rhetoric. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is E, because there is a map that resembles E drawn on the map, apparently so that Beatrice can find a cafe to meet Lemony. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #1) In a second letter written on Wednesday, Beatrice Baudelaire II, a child adopted by Violet, Klaus and Sunny Baudelaire, asks Lemoner to help her find the three siblings with whom she was separated. The kick from the letter accompanying this letter is E, like the first, because on the sidelines, E was sketched out, apparently, Lemony trying to figure out if the letter was tampered with by some villain or another. (E. is the original V.F.D., given by Esme Squire and Eleanor Po, both of which fit the description of the villain.) (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #2) In the third letter written in the Year of the Snake, Lemony contacts Beatrice because he misses her. Here are a few things: that V.F.D had a class code, and that Lemony attends this class with O. One can assume that this O. is Count Olaf, as O. is called a man and is described as nothing but irritation, and as one eye-browed. This letter shows that Olaf's villainous character began to form at his early age. The letter also found that Batceer was an anagram for Beatrice, and that Beatrice once specialized in training bats at school. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is N, for the scribble drawn on the letter, which should represent a mountain, as in the letter he mentions that there is a climbing class of some kind that they will attend. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #2) In a fourth letter written on February 28, Beatrice Baudelaire II writes from a typewriter in the small, dusty office of Lemonic Snicket, on the thirteenth floor of one of the city's nine dreary buildings. The letter says she will follow a map that was marked by Lemony in his office to find his location and find out the whereabouts of her lost family. The kick from the letter accompanying this letter is S, for the S form Lachrymose Leech paper weight on his desk that Beatrice mentions but does not recognize. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #3) In the fifth Written on Scriabin's anniversary, it turned out that the Duchess of Winnipeg is dead, and that a member of the W.F.D.R. is her daughter. It also revealed here that The Daily Punctilio is an unreliable source of information, because although Lemonia is an assistant obituary spell-checker, he has no right to correct a headline that reads: The Duchess of Winnipeg is deaf. He also predicts that J. will be handed over to the Financial Times, meaning that G., this stupid girl, will become the new fashion editor, meaning that Lemona is likely to be given the position of dramatic critic. While it is too difficult to determine what J. means, it is most likely Josephine Anwhistle. G. is most likely favored by Geraldine Julianne, who opens up in a series of books to be a big fan of Esme Squalor's trendy outfits. The kick from the letter accompanying this letter is I representing Hatpin Beatrice that she fell off the stage after her bows after Friday's performance of My Silence Knot, signaling to Lemony that she would meet him later as usual. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #3) In the sixth letter written at 4 p.m., Beatrice writes Lemony from the cave in which he remained as a bra-man. As a result, she will see the ring of R. to a group of shepherds for a walk yak in the cave. The only thing left in the cave was the piece of paper on which Beatrice wrote the letter. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is K, which was written, Lemonia, in the corner of the paper. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #4) In the seventh letter written two weeks after his previous letter, Lemony writes to tell Beatrice that he misses her terribly. Lemony mentions that he can't bring himself to argue with E. or G., and in the afternoon he can't remember to call L. 'O' or call O.L. We can assume it's E. Eleanor Po, since she works with Lemony, and he talks about his work. G. has already been created as Geraldine Julianne. A., who preferred to be called L., refers to Olivia Caliban, who ran the Caligari Carnival and used the name Madame Lulu. The identity of L.A., preferred to be named O., is unknown, but may refer to Count Olaf or the huge androgynous. The letter accompanying this letter is R, since R. received this letter by accident. Attached to the letter is a small note from R., which says: Beatrice - This letter was mistakenly delivered to me. Obviously bats need the best trainers! I hope you're back in time. - R (Beatrice Baudelaire in Lemony Snickets #4) In the eighth letter written on the eve of Victoria Day, Beatrice writes from the secretarial school, in particular the business letter Writing class, taught by the same instructor that Lemony took his class of code writing with. (She describes the same flat-footed instructor that Lemony did.) continues by saying that she followed Lemony to the library, where he stood for nearly an hour staring into a glass case containing old documents on display for Staged Poetry: Sonnets actors and actresses exhibition where Beatrice Baudelaire sonnet My Silence Knot was once located. In a letter to the editor at the end of the book, however, Lemony makes it clear that he no longer exists by being refiled under the name Beatrice Baudelaire. The blow from the letter accompanying this letter is A, for A, that Beatrice Baudelaire II received at her appointment to submit her correspondence in the form of a business letter. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Beatrice #5) In the ninth letter written at dusk, Lemony addresses Beatrice with longing. Although Beatrice initially accepted his marriage proposal, she later wrote him a 200-page book telling him why she couldn't marry him after all. Lemoudi tries in her letter to answer the thirteen questions she asked on page 189. In the letter, Lemony uses Sebald's code, asking, Are you sure your co-star is one of us? that this means Olaf, but later in the letter he is disqualified from this possibility when Lemoumi writes: I will love you if you marry someone else - your co-star, maybe, or ya, or even O., or anyone z. through A., even R. Punch-out letter accompanying this letter is C, for the form created by the lock of beatrice. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #5) The tenth letter, written midway through the Days of Awe, was written by Beatrice in her office in the Rhetorical Building. She once again asks the attention of Lemonia, so that they can together unravel the secrets of Baudelaire's orphans. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is a T,-shaped tool that Beatrice used to drill a hole in the floor of her office to slip her letter up to Lemony's office. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #6) The Eleventh letter is a telegram sent at the end of the summer from Limonia Beatrice shortly after she married Bertrand Baudelaire, and became pregnant with Violet. There is a message of danger sent at the end, but all you can see is the waterlogged letters A. For this reason, a blow from the letter A accompanies the telegram. It is not possible to confirm whether this message reached Beatrice. (Beatrice Baudelaire - Lemony Snicket #6) The twelfth letter written during cocktails is on a map of the same size as the very first message that Lemoniya sent to Beatrice. It is labeled as Beatrice Baudelaire, Baticeer Extraordinaire, The Rhetoric Building 14th Floor. This map contains only a short message resembling Lemony's first letter, Beatrice Baudelaire. After apologizing for embarrassing him, Beatrice asks Lemony with her as she was in the same restaurant as he was. There is no evidence whether or not Lemony accepted or rejected the message, but the fact that it was not torn in half (as Beatrice asked Lemona to do if he didn't want to meet her) could be proof that they met. The kick from the letter accompanying this message is B, as Beatrice signed the message B, not Beatrice Baudelaire. The thirteenth letter written today, from Lemonia to its editor, in which he explains the difficulties of trying to find a sonnet called My Knot of Silence. He also explains the difficulty of having to withstand the memories associated with these letters in an attempt to put them in the right order. He doesn't sign this letter as he usually does, and so it actually counts as the final note of the series. My silence knotted my silence knot after a letter to the editor, in the back cover of the book, is a page from the play that Beatrice Baudelaire acted in. Punch-Out Letters Also containing letters of correspondence, Beatrice Letters contains twelve kick of letters that relate to certain letters of correspondence in the book. Letters, in order, E, E, N, S, I, K, R, A, C, T, A and B. By rearranging these letters, you can spell a few things. BRAE SNICKET A is an perpetual article pertaining to nothing in particular, and just a general recognition of something. Brae comes from the northern English/Scottish bra'aw, which meant eyebrows or eyelids, which in themselves can mean the hair on the very glaring dome of Count Olaf's head. This can also refer to the eye tattoo of VFD on Olaf's ankle. Brae also means declivity or hill slope. While the questions Beatrice asks Lemony in her 200-page answer are unknown, Lemony answers the sixth question: A man who lives in the mountains. Beatrice presumably asked for the definition of a brae person who is like the person (presumably Olaf) mentioned in his previous letter. While this may refer to a member of the Snicket family, Snicket also means a narrow passageway between houses or an alley. This may be a reference to the WFD tunnels. In other words, it can mean a sloping narrow passage, or a lopsided snicker. At first it may seem that this applies either to Beatrice Baudelaire (the late love of Lemonic and the Baudelaire mother) or to Beatrice Baudelaire II (niece of Lemonic Snicket). But it is customary to keep in mind Beatrice, the Boat of Baudelaires, which was on and off the island. How Violet, Klaus and Sunny Baudelaire survived this journey is unknown, but it is known that they reached the shore. In Beatrice Letters, BB for LS #3, at the bottom of the page, Beatrice notes that Sunny discusses her recipes on the radio, meaning that Kids are actually survive and make their own way in life. It turned out that Beatrice Baudelaire II did survive, but whether she was able to make contact with Lemony Snicket is unknown. BEAR A SNICKET This can represent Keith giving birth to his baby. The Beatrice Letters poster also contains a two-way poster. On one side, Beatrice can be seen shipwrecked against a large cliff, along with a whisk, spatula, hair band, glasses, and the name of a boat plate that broke in half, presumably Baudelaire's children's items. On the other side of the poster is a view from inside the cave. The bowler's hat, like the one Lemony Snicket wears in many of his photos, sits on the floor, suggesting that Lemony Snicket was there at some point in time. There are also books, including one open to a page with photos of kitchen utensils; Klaus's glasses image an image of Violet's hair tape; Dining room Locked metal box; Binoculars and the other half of the sign with Beatrice's name. These subjects do this as if someone, perhaps Beatrice Baudelaire II, had been researching Baudelaire's orphans there. It could be a cave mentioned in BB to LS #3. The kick from the letter accompanying this letter is E, like the first, because on the sidelines, E was sketched out, apparently, Lemony trying to figure out if the letter was tampered with by some villain or another. (E. is the original V.F.D., given by Esme Squire and Eleanor Po, both of which fit the description of the villain.) (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #2) In the third letter written in the Year of the Snake, Lemony contacts Beatrice because he misses her. Here are a few things: that V.F.D had a class code, and that Lemony attends this class with O. One can assume that this O. is Count Olaf, as O. is called a man and is described as nothing but irritation, and as one eye-browed. This letter shows that Olaf's villainous character began to form at his early age. The letter also found that Batceer was an anagram for Beatrice, and that Beatrice once specialized in training bats at school. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is N, for the scribble drawn on the letter, which should represent a mountain, as in the letter he mentions that there is a climbing class of some kind that they will attend. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #2) In a fourth letter written on February 28, Beatrice Baudelaire II writes from a typewriter in the small, dusty office of Lemonic Snicket, on the thirteenth floor of one of the city's nine dreary buildings. The letter says she will follow a map that was marked by Lemony in his office to find his location and find out the whereabouts of her lost family. The kick from the letter accompanying this letter is S, for the S form Lachrymose Leech paper weight on his desk that Beatrice mentions but does not recognize. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #3) In the fifth Written on Scriabin's anniversary, it turned out that the Duchess of Winnipeg is dead, and that a member of the W.F.D.R. is her daughter. It also revealed here that The Daily Punctilio is an unreliable source of information, because although Lemonia is an assistant obituary spell-checker, he has no right to correct a headline that reads: The Duchess of Winnipeg is deaf. He also predicts that J. will be handed over to the Financial Times, meaning that G., this stupid girl, will become the new fashion editor, meaning that Lemona is likely to be given the position of dramatic critic. While it is too difficult to determine what J. means, it is most likely Josephine Anwhistle. G. is most likely favored by Geraldine Julianne, who opens up in a series of books to be a big fan of Esme Squalor's trendy outfits. The kick from the letter accompanying this letter is I representing Hatpin Beatrice that she fell off the stage after her bows after Friday's performance of My Silence Knot, signaling to Lemony that she would meet him later as usual. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #3) In the sixth letter written at 4 p.m., Beatrice writes Lemony from the cave in which he remained as a bra-man. As a result, she will see the ring of R. to a group of shepherds for a walk yak in the cave. The only thing left in the cave was the piece of paper on which Beatrice wrote the letter. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is K, which was written, Lemonia, in the corner of the paper. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #4) In the seventh letter written two weeks after his previous letter, Lemony writes to tell Beatrice that he misses her terribly. Lemony mentions that he can't bring himself to argue with E. or G., and in the afternoon he can't remember to call L. 'O' or call O.L. We can assume it's E. Eleanor Po, since she works with Lemony, and he talks about his work. G. has already been created as Geraldine Julianne. A., who preferred to be called L., refers to Olivia Caliban, who ran the Caligari Carnival and used the name Madame Lulu. The identity of L.A., preferred to be named O., is unknown, but may refer to Count Olaf or the huge androgynous. The letter accompanying this letter is R, since R. received this letter by accident. Attached to the letter is a small note from R., which says: Beatrice - This letter was mistakenly delivered to me. Obviously bats need the best trainers! I hope you're back in time. - R (Beatrice Baudelaire in Lemony Snickets #4) In the eighth letter written on the eve of Victoria Day, Beatrice writes from the secretarial school, in particular the business letter Writing class, taught by the same instructor that Lemony took his class of code writing with. (She describes the same flat-footed instructor that Lemony did.) continues by saying that she followed Lemony to the library, where he stood for nearly an hour staring into a glass case containing old documents on display for Staged Poetry: Sonnets actors and actresses exhibition where Beatrice Baudelaire sonnet My Silence Knot was once located. In a letter to the editor at the end of the book, however, Lemony makes it clear that he no longer exists by being refiled under the name Beatrice Baudelaire. The blow from the letter accompanying this letter is A, for A, that Beatrice Baudelaire II received at her appointment to submit her correspondence in the form of a business letter. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Beatrice #5) In the ninth letter written at dusk, Lemony addresses Beatrice with longing. Although Beatrice initially accepted his marriage proposal, she later wrote him a 200-page book telling him why she couldn't marry him after all. Lemoudi tries in her letter to answer the thirteen questions she asked on page 189. In the letter, Lemony uses Sebald's code, asking, Are you sure your co-star is one of us? that this means Olaf, but later in the letter he is disqualified from this possibility when Lemoumi writes: I will love you if you marry someone else - your co-star, maybe, or ya, or even O., or anyone z. through A., even R. Punch-out letter accompanying this letter is C, for the form created by the lock of beatrice. (Beatrice Baudelaire II in Lemony Snicket #5) The tenth letter, written midway through the Days of Awe, was written by Beatrice in her office in the Rhetorical Building. She once again asks the attention of Lemonia, so that they can together unravel the secrets of Baudelaire's orphans. The punch-out letter accompanying this letter is a T,-shaped tool that Beatrice used to drill a hole in the floor of her office to slip her letter up to Lemony's office. (Lemony Snicket Beatrice Baudelaire #6) The Eleventh letter is a telegram sent at the end of the summer from Limonia Beatrice shortly after she married Bertrand Baudelaire, and became pregnant with Violet. There is a message of danger sent at the end, but all you can see is the waterlogged letters A. For this reason, a blow from the letter A accompanies the telegram. It is not possible to confirm whether this message reached Beatrice. (Beatrice Baudelaire - Lemony Snicket #6) The twelfth letter written during cocktails is on a map of the same size as the very first message that Lemoniya sent to Beatrice. It is labeled as Beatrice Baudelaire, Baticeer Extraordinaire, The Rhetoric Building 14th Floor. This map contains only a short message resembling Lemony's first letter, Beatrice Baudelaire. After apologizing for embarrassing him, Beatrice asks Lemony with her as she was in the same restaurant as he was. There is no evidence whether or not Lemony accepted or rejected the message, but the fact that it was not torn in half (as Beatrice asked Lemona to do if he didn't want to meet her) could be proof that they met. The kick from the letter accompanying this message is B, as Beatrice signed the message B, not Beatrice Baudelaire. The thirteenth letter written today, from Lemonia to its editor, in which he explains the difficulties of trying to find a sonnet called My Knot of Silence. He also explains the difficulty of having to withstand the memories associated with these letters in an attempt to put them in the right order. He doesn't sign this letter as he usually does, and so it actually counts as the final note of the series. My silence knotted my silence knot after a letter to the editor, in the back cover of the book, is a page from the play that Beatrice Baudelaire acted in. Punch-Out Letters Also containing letters of correspondence, Beatrice Letters contains twelve kick of letters that relate to certain letters of correspondence in the book. Letters, in order, E, E, N, S, I, K, R, A, C, T, A and B. By rearranging these letters, you can spell a few things. BRAE SNICKET A is an perpetual article pertaining to nothing in particular, and just a general recognition of something. Brae comes from the northern English/Scottish bra'aw, which meant eyebrows or eyelids, which in themselves can mean the hair on the very glaring dome of Count Olaf's head. This can also refer to the eye tattoo of VFD on Olaf's ankle. Brae also means declivity or hill slope. While the questions Beatrice asks Lemony in her 200-page answer are unknown, Lemony answers the sixth question: A man who lives in the mountains. Beatrice presumably asked for the definition of a brae person who is like the person (presumably Olaf) mentioned in his previous letter. While this may refer to a member of the Snicket family, Snicket also means a narrow passageway between houses or an alley. This may be a reference to the WFD tunnels. In other words, it can mean a sloping narrow passage, or a lopsided snicker. At first it may seem that this applies either to Beatrice Baudelaire (the late love of Lemonic and the Baudelaire mother) or to Beatrice Baudelaire II (niece of Lemonic Snicket). But it is customary to keep in mind Beatrice, the Boat of Baudelaires, which was on and off the island. How Violet, Klaus and Sunny Baudelaire survived this journey is unknown, but it is known that they reached the shore. In Beatrice Letters, BB for LS #3, at the bottom of the page, Beatrice notes that Sunny discusses her recipes on the radio, meaning that Kids are actually survive and make their own way in life. It turned out that Beatrice Baudelaire II did survive, but whether she was able to make contact with Lemony Snicket is unknown. BEAR A SNICKET This can represent Keith giving birth to his baby. The Beatrice Letters poster also contains a two-way poster. On one side, Beatrice can be seen shipwrecked against a large cliff, along with a whisk, spatula, hair band, glasses, and the name of a boat plate that broke in half, presumably Baudelaire's children's items. On the other side of the poster is a view from inside the cave. The bowler's hat, like the one Lemony Snicket wears in many of his photos, sits on the floor, suggesting that Lemony Snicket was there at some point in time. There are also books, including one open to a page with photos of kitchen utensils; Klaus's glasses image an image of Violet's hair tape; Dining room Locked metal box; Binoculars and the other half of the sign with Beatrice's name. These subjects do this as if someone, perhaps Beatrice Baudelaire II, had been researching Baudelaire's orphans there. It could be a cave mentioned in BB to LS #3.
