Families can find an inmate by their first and last name or by the inmate's booking number. Not only does it contain personal information to prisoners, but also the reason why an inmate is serving his period in the facility. With the lessor owned the personnel of the installation can check the reason why an inmate is imprisoned. Before we start discussing the various tools to help you locate your loved one, let's quickly make it clear that you'll need to have some vital identifying information at your fingertips to do this. This information includes:the full legal name of the loved one (first, middle, and last)The date of birthThe declaration in which it is kept inNote that some tools may suggest or request additional information from you. Now for the inmate's location tools. That's what I said, BOP search only shows the results for federal prisoners. To find an inmate who is being held in a local prison or a state prison, you will want to use the state government website in which the loved one is located. While we're not going to take you through the step-by-step process of finding an inmate in each state, let's take a look at a few examples: Here's what you'll need if your loved one is incarcerated in New York: Notice that Department ID Number or New York State Number ID are meant to be used on their own. In other words, if you include any of these numbers, you don't need to include the inmate's name and year of birth. Similarly, to find an inmate in California, you will need to enter either their full legal name or their inmate number, if you know: While most states offer the opportunity to search an inmate on their official government website, others use a third-party search tool, which we will discuss in the next section. The Bureau of Prisons allows you to search its federal prisoner database to locate your loved one and discover their contact information. Note that this database includes only inmates held in federal prisons - we will reach smaller prisons and prisons in a moment. The BOP database also includes information on prisoners who have been released since 1982. When you use the BOP search tool, you can search for a prisoner by name or a variety of identification numbers. First, let's look for an inmate using their name: Again, searching for a common name without additional information leads to a large number of search results. Also note that the search engine limits the number of results to 100 - which means a bunch of other prisoners named John Smith didn't even show up. Obviously, it's not likely that you'll face this problem, but it's definitely good to know. In any case, you can also narrow the search by including the race, age and gender of the loved one. Because this search tool does not offer advanced search features, you may need to include this information to see fewer than 100 results. You can also search for a federal inmate using a different number of identification numbers, such as: BOP Registry Number DCDC NUMBER FBI Number INS Number Since these identification numbers, of course, belong exclusively to the loved one, using this method is the best way to generate accurate results on the BOP website.
