Non-market strategies include public financial assistance, the development of new environmental regulations and the harmonization of very expensive health and pension systems. Meanwhile, GM has failed to create strategies to effectively compete with foreign automakers. By 2005, many of GM's strategic decisions appeared to be inappropriate. Some of them, which were undertaken for short-term gain, had disastrous long-term consequences, and GM performed poorly compared to other global automakers. Many strategies seemed disjointed without a common vision or purpose: GM was facing a serious crisis. In 2005-2006, GM introduced several new strategies. The question of whether these strategies can achieve sustainable profitability or whether they will also have undesirable consequences is important for employees, shareholders and Governments around the world. An attorney hired by General Motors has reportedly begun a meeting with a lawyer representing the plaintiffs in a lawsuit related to the company's ignition switch recall to discuss what a potential settlement of the claims would look like regardless of when the accidents occurred, Reuters reported on Tuesday. Attorney Robert Hilliard is an attorney representing more than 300 people and families with claims of injury or death due to the now-recalled vehicles (all 2.59 million of them), and told Reuters that attorney Kenneth Feinberg, who represents GM, initiated the meeting at Feinberg's Washington office. Feinberg, who helped negotiate settlements and claims for events such as the BP Deepwater Horizon disaster and the 9/11 attacks, acknowledged by email to Reuters that the meeting took place but declined further comment on the matter. However, his confirmation of the meeting indicates that the company is making significant progress in reaching affected individuals and families, at least in some aspects. The meeting seemed designed to convince me that they (GM) would do the right thing by people who were injured or killed as a result of a faulty switch, Hilliard told the publication, but he added that no agreement had been reached on the financial details. He said it would likely include General Motors taking legal responsibility for injuries or deaths from all accidents, regardless of when they occurred, and, basically, investigations have not yet been done.
