According to reports, several customers have contacted Lenovo with complaints about the alleged failures of its tablets. If Lenovo decides to recall the tablet devices, it will cost its customers. The Lenovo ThinkPad X220 tablet was first released in the month of July and was considered one of the best 7-inch tablets available at that time. That's not to say it is now outdated, but customers are reportedly complaining that it gets heated up so much that it overheats. Apparently, when this happens, the battery's life is cut down to 1.5 hours. This can be annoying and inconvenient for users who are relying on these tablets to do so much. There have been several incidents where the fan has been in a state of emergency, with fans going at high speeds. However, with the high-powered GPU in this tablet, high speed fans and performance of the chips are not necessarily the main issue. Apparently, there have been some power supply issues as well. Although this recall is a highly unusual case, the X220 tablet is quite similar to the Galaxy Tab 7.0 Plus, which has faced similar complaints. Samsung's tablets are also getting complaints about overheating and high power consumption. As a result, some customers have claimed that they have spent thousands of dollars to replace their Samsung devices. When the X220 tablets first came out, it was criticized due to its high price tag. It was also in the midst of a heated competition with the iPad, so Lenovo needed to make sure that it had something on its side. However, it seems like the recall is backfiring on the tablet maker. It is reported that some of the tablets could still be in customers' possession, so they might have to deal with the issue. According to the users of these devices, they have to wait for Lenovo to respond to all these complaints and get more info about this problem. This 520fdb1ae7
