(March 21, 2018) Yard Sale Treasure Map is a Google Maps map designed to help you find and easily reach the Craigslist yard sales in your area. You enter the starting address, driving radius and choose it from Friday, Saturday or Sunday. The Yard Sale Treasure Card then asks Craigslist for your area, and returns the route that will lead you to all the yard sales it finds. You can click on the tokens for each sale to see more information about the sale and remove them if you are not interested. You can also add in sales that you will find from other sources like your local paper, either put an address in the left sidebar or double-click on the map to place a new marker. This amazingly elegant hack is free to use. The Yard Sale Treasure Map (via GeekSugar) from the 15,000-foot, $2.5 million home at 123 Highland Drive in the area of Seattle's queen Anne doesn't look like much. The roof is a nondescript gray square; yard, a tiny patch of fuzzy space. That doesn't bother Matt Bell, sales manager in the new home market. It focuses on numbers flickering at the bottom of the web browser two feet before it, constantly updated statistics such as average property value, county tax records, local schools, and previous sales prices. Eh, he sighs. That's $538 per square foot, but the neighborhood average is just $420. Choosing not to leave a comment on the open house blog, Bell abandons 123 Highland and scales back over the city, neighborhood room blur to keep up with it. Forget point A to point B: Internet maps move from simple driving directions to richly layered landscapes of living, breathable information. More than 1,000 new map-based websites were launched last year, with 3 to 4 more debuted every 24 hours. VCs throw money at any of them that promise to transform industries such as real estate and local stores. And the people of the map are hungry. In a Pew Institute poll last April, cell phone users called maps the most desirable feature. (Instant messaging was second.) We're not just talking about the best maps: digital maps are the internet equivalent of the Blizzard dairy queen. They allow users to mix a huge amount of previously disparate data and display it as they please, and even add their own images, videos, comments or other content. Google, Yahoo, and Microsoft all see this as huge; they spend millions to add both high-end satellite photography and street-level images to maps. But all the frantic activity leaves one nagging question: Can these developers and corporations chart a path to profit? If you want to understand what an Internet map world can be like, look at Europe, where there is a higher level of adoption of mapping technologies. In the United States, for example, passengers receive traffic updates from frantic helicopter pilots screaming on the Tangled AM radio; it's literally a top-down model. Many European drivers use a more elegant solution. TomTom, Europe's leading automotive navigation company, is dynamically updating traffic conditions on maps in users' GPS devices, including which roads are congested due to accidents or roadworks and even the location of high-speed traps, all with the help of its subscribers. In fact, travelers form instant communities to learn together about their environment. In the United States, people are just beginning to catch on to the power of these communities. Traditionally, in real estate, you have to go to a county records office or police station, and pores through dusty file cabinets to get information that a website such as Redfin.com can show up in a couple of clicks. We want to organize information geospatially, says Redfin CEO Glenn Kelman, so that people looking for a home can capture the Gestalt neighborhood. For example The home may ask why the house is more expensive than others in the rest of the area, and the seller can respond by adding on the map about recent renovations, even posting before and after photos. Such features keep the average user on Redfin for an impressive 72 minutes per week. The map is mostly centerfold - it's pornographic, says Kelman. People who hang out for long periods of time, contributing their knowledge to the local community, and developers and advertisers are excited about new opportunities in online search. Maps allow for exciting searches, says Steven Lawler, general manager of Microsoft's MapPoint division. You can see the real world as you understand it. Microsoft recently debuted a map technology called Virtual Earth, featuring a bird's-eye view of 3-D photography. Groups of like-minded people can add ratings and reviews by sharing individual cards with others. It is also testing an even more ambitious app built from thousands of street-level photos that allows visitors to maneuver through downtown Seattle and San Francisco. Both mapping-based search tools will offer businesses an unprecedented type of targeted advertising. Imagine a retailer would look after any customers panning over its location. Advertising is just one option being discussed in a nascent industry desperate for a revenue model. Google, Yahoo and Microsoft are currently subsidizing growth in mapping. It costs Google money to pull up the map, says John Musser, a blogger and software developer. It's all free now, but it can't go on forever. Targeted advertising may be the answer, but will developers and users accept it? Meanwhile, subscriptions have worked in Europe but have generally not been covered by online consumers in the United States. I don't think any of us expected how ubiquitous maps will become, admits Bret Taylor, Google Maps' product manager. We launched GeoAds, a map advertising program, this April as the first attempt to offset the maintenance costs of so many of them. The map is basically centerfold - it's pornographic, says Glenn Kelman, CEO of real estate startup Redfin.com. Along with questions about money come questions about control. Throughout history, the guy who controlled the card was the boss, said John Metcalfe, a former CMO at cartographer Tele Atlas who is now a Silicon Valley consultant to VCs. But it raises the prospect of unhappy sponsors and other users because neither can control what is said about them. However, the industry is now advocating for closer cooperation with its customers. After all, companies can't predict all that want, and the content created by the user gives them more to sell. We are certainly encouraging users to customize their content and share their experiences, says Jocelyn Vigreux, President of TomTom USA. United States. Sign of a healthy community. We don't need to control everything. Whether users are generated or not, map apps are rapidly evolving from novelty to necessity. You don't just want to find 7-Eleven, says Metcalfe, you want to find one that carries your brand of toothpaste, and it's open right now. The future lies in mapping.
