The patient was a 45-year-old housewife with a prominent buried knee. The diagnosis was made by the patient's history and clinical examination. The authors performed osteotomy of the tibia and fibula and transposition of the distal tibia with interposition of a microfiber allograft and stabilized the knee with plate and screw system. The authors used three plates and screws. The patient was in weightbearing until after postoperative 9 months and was walking without crutches.Carolina Christians hope to sue over gun-control group June 5, 2013 Written by AP CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) — A group of Carolina Christians is trying to join a lawsuit filed against three North Carolina gun control groups, claiming they have used taxpayer money to spread lies about the federal government's ban on assault weapons. The North Carolina chapter of Alliance Defending Freedom says the lawsuit was filed Monday in a federal court in Charlotte. Alliance, a conservative Christian legal group based in Scottsdale, Ariz., is acting as local counsel for the group. A judge last month dismissed a similar lawsuit filed by the Center for Freedom and Prosperity, a pro-business group based in Charlotte. The lawsuit filed Monday argues that the pro-gun control groups violate the U.S. Constitution. It seeks damages from David C. Addison, president of Americans for Responsible Solutions, who is among the plaintiffs in the Center for Freedom and Prosperity lawsuit, and the three organizations he leads, the New York-based Giffords Law Center to Prevent Gun Violence, the New York-based Everytown for Gun Safety and the Washington, D.C.-based Giffords Law Center to Prevent Gun Violence. Addison has been an outspoken critic of the federal ban on assault weapons. He has also pushed for legislation requiring background checks for all gun purchases, as well as a ban on the production and sale of bump stocks, attachments that allow semiautomatic weapons to fire like automatic weapons. Addison's lawsuits have raised objections from gun control groups, legal experts and some gun-rights
