Approaching Stadium Autzen on Saturday was far different than a typical walk to the historic football stadium. Instead of college students dressed toe tops in Oregon University gear, fool music fans music has sported brown leather boots, rhinestone-covered jeans and classic 10-gallon cowboy hats – all ready to see the top-selling salon artists in American history. Country legend Garth Brooks played the sold-out show in for a record-breaking 60,000 participants. About 60,000 people fill StadiumYom Autzen for Garth Brooks' concert June 29, 2019. (Hunters reed/ emerald) The city of Eugene Gifted and fan Garth Brooks celebrated the next concert. Eugene was the only west coast stop at the Brooks Stadium Tour, drawing fans throughout west coast to showcase on June 29. In preparation for the show, fans packed into every parking lot around the stadium, all the way to the commercial center River Valley and began fighting as early as six hours before the concert began. An hour before the show, boats from Autzen Stadium are announceed across the Willamette River. People sang Brooks' name, singing his lyrics and carrying signs that proclaimed their love and his devotion. As the performance approached, they presented a countdown on the step screens. This is your five-minute context, an ad told the crowd. And every man got up from the throne, and put their hands in the air, and their joy was turned away from God. The clock hit 10 seconds and the 60,000-pound crowd joined in for a countdown. Brooks' 10-member band ran out on the scene, starting the instrumental introduction of his hit song, All Long Day. Brooks, where they carried her old cowboy cream hat and brown leather boots, walked out with guitar and guitar in her hand, Truly, bringing nashville energy to Eugene. Many who attend Garth Brooks's concert concert arrived at the Autzen Stadium early with the parking lot tailor. (Gina Scalpone / Emerald) Brooks and his strips were in the elements – back on stage, making for a crowd filled with dedicated fans. The stadium erupted in the cheese in his eye. Man, now I see why they call places that most of earth! we are having some fun at night, Brooks exclaimed to the crowd. Sky Clear recalled Brooks in a common idiom he heard about the stadium. The audience joined him and cried: 'It's never raining in Autzen! He affirmed while that may be true, had to make sure he had some thunderstorms that night. The speakers roar with thundering sounds like the guitar and singing the fidle-driven Rolls Thunder began. An obvious crowd favorite, the people in the crowd jumping up and down. The next song, We must be free, something about a world where the first thing we notice is the beauty, accompanied by a chorus of 800 local church members. His background vocal from 27 years old, Robert Bailey, a native of Oregon, helped orchestrate the performance with the choir, Brooks said. Bailey has spent the last two weeks secretly practicing and the assembly in preparation for the show, the Register-Guard reported. Brooks continues to give special moments to Autzen. It brought about the Oregon tradition of singing called by the Isley Brothers almost every event. Bailey, who acted in the call scene from the film Animal House, kicked off the pronouncement with the 800-person enemy. The choir and the crowd started dancing and singing with each other. Everyone was throwing their hands in the air as they sing the chorus, Shout! Garth Brooks speaks at a press conference the day before his concert at Stadium Autzen during the Stadium Tour on June 28, 2019. (Marissa Willeke / Emerald) As the show came to an end, he played one of his most famous hits, Low Places. The kanna puddles and Oregon researchers equipped with confession cannons alongside him on stage. As soon as the chorus hit, confession filled the stadium, raining on the passionate crowd singing. Brooks was pressing to hear the audience's lyrics in unison, never missing a single word. Brooks locked up the song with a heartfelt feeling about how, for much of her life, her fans were there for her in low places. Fans started beating him on. The love he expressed to his fans was more than reciprocal. As the concerts came to a close, many were reluctant to leave. Brooks' performance is crafted with the intention of bringing something special in Eugene. The smash-sized crowd seemed to agree. After the show ended, the spilling out of the stadium continues to ring across the Willamette. Willamette Sr.
