description Spark - 1 Student Book Description Let's start from the beginning... Why are we doing this project? Why is the Spark Project important? Roughly one year ago (Spring 2014) I met students and teachers at Woodland Elementary School (Flint, Michigan). Over a summer, we met in San Francisco, Portland, Oregon, and more. We studied the Spark Project concept, and learned how to follow the different versions of the Spark Project or the Spark Project in the U.S. The last time we met was at The University of Michigan in Ann Arbor, and it was amazing. We know that this was a time of crisis for Michigan, for Flint. We know that it affected the students, and the teachers. The semester before had been the first in which we studied The Spark Project. Students were excited about the idea of starting from scratch to create their own project. Teachers were excited about their students' enthusiasm and energy. It was a powerful and inspiring time. Sedona student Matt Flanigan got a chance to see the Michigan National Guard cars and their crews at work in Flint. Sedona student Nick Kilgore spent the last few days of his first full summer at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor. Nick is on a full scholarship to the University of Michigan. Sedona student Brooke Staack is a lot of fun. Brooke is probably one of the most positive students I have ever met. She never seems to complain about her conditions or her resources. She has overcome more than anyone I have ever met! Sedona student Rebecca Majors is a little less confident. At times, Rebecca seems to disappear into her iPod. But she gets the project done. She is a caring and thoughtful person. Sedona student Emily Walsh and I (Sean) have gotten to know each other better. Emily is a classic 'odd ball' student. Her energy and enthusiasm is always infectious. Sedona student Andrew Cooper and I have spent a lot of time together in the past two weeks. Andrew is a great and calm leader. He has led well in crisis situations. He is also a very positive young man. The Spark Project's purpose is to teach students to collaborate and work together. In this project, they are
