This study was carried out to determine the effects of freezing and thawing on the morphological characteristics of rat spermatozoa. The sperm suspensions were prepared by swim-up procedure. These spermatozoa were frozen and thawed by using both 0.5 M sucrose and commercial freezing medium. For thawing, the frozen-thawed sperm suspensions were diluted in either a modified Hoagland's medium or PBS (phosphate buffered saline) containing 0.1% (w/v) sodium dodecyl sulfate. The morphological characteristics of the spermatozoa were examined by light and electron microscopes. The 0.5 M sucrose-thawed samples showed lower percentage of spermatozoa with intact membranes, acrosomes and normal head structure when compared with the thawed samples in PBS. The 0.5 M sucrose-thawed samples also showed lower percentage of intact acrosomes and with normal acrosome shape. The 0.5 M sucrose-thawed samples showed morphological changes in tail when compared with the thawed samples in PBS. The morphological changes were not observed in the thawed samples in PBS. The results showed that 0.5 M sucrose-thawed spermatozoa had some morphological changes compared to thawed samples in PBS. Thus, the use of sucrose as a cryoprotectant is suggested for freezing the rat spermatozoa.
