A Russian must have their passport prior to entry to the UK, but individuals do not have to be Russian to be able to apply for one. Passport offices are likely to be open on Saturdays, too, a significant advantage for those of modest means who must travel before Sunday for the latest edition of the register. We may also see a move to make permanent residents, i.e. those who are here for a while, into British citizens in the wake of this newspaper's reports of widespread fraud and exploitation, potentially in the tens of thousands. That would provide them with a more powerful means of staying here, as well as a number of advantages. Russia has one of the oldest and most flexible passports in the world, with little difference between the two top classes – diplomatic and resident. Non-diplomatic passports are more expensive, but the residence class can be renewed for 10 years. Russia also has a large number of special visas, including business visas, that are renewed for five years. These can be applied for at any passport office in the world, and do not require a long wait. The only requirement is that you have to prove that you own the business, or that it undertakes no activity in Britain. Making Russian citizens into British citizens could be more complicated, however, with a higher level of scrutiny for a number of reasons. Among the main ones are the enormous flows of personal data to intelligence agencies from numerous sources. Only a year ago, the Home Office was forced to concede that the government had been reading the private text messages of over a million people without their knowledge or consent. Moreover, to apply for British citizenship, you have to prove that you have lived in the UK for a total of a year. But this requirement could be swept away in the post-Brexit exodus of the millionaires, who could have come here for years without becoming long-term residents.
