Psychological and behavioural changes in rats subjected to the conditioned fear paradigm. The conditioned fear paradigm in rats is a well-established animal model of human anxiety disorders. To study the physiological and behavioural changes in rats subjected to the conditioned fear paradigm, a shock-scenario test with unconditioned stimuli (UCS) was performed after subjecting rats to the conditioned fear paradigm with different training procedures. The results demonstrated that the rats without training showed the highest number of fear response episodes; however, the locomotor activities were low. The rats that were trained three times with 10 UCS showed relatively low fear responses, and their locomotor activities were comparable to those of the rats without training. However, the rats that were trained four times with 10 UCS showed higher fear responses and also increased locomotor activities. The rats with a training period of 5 times with 10 UCS did not show significant fear responses, and their locomotor activities were low. The results suggest that a longer training period is needed to attenuate fear responses and decrease locomotor activities. Constantine Dimitriadis Constantine (C.)
