This is really the first question you should ask yourself. Some things to think about: What are your reasons for wanting a farm? What knowledge do you have about agriculture - labor, machinery, and how to garden? Will you be able to slaughter the animal or part with the one you attached to it? Before you start cleaning the local newspaper for cattle, take a step back. What are your goals for your small farm? What kind of farm are you planning? A small farm can range from half an acre with several laying chickens and a small vegetarian garden, to 40 acres of cattle, dairy cows, sheep, goats, chickens, pigs and acres of wild crops and vegetables. Some of your options will be limited to your land and resources, but we'll get to that later. First, let yourself dream. Which animals will you like? What vegetables, fruits and grains do you want to grow? Make a list of everything you have on your farm - even if it's years old. This is your dream, your perfect small farm. Marcia Straub/Getty Images This is a great exercise to explore your land and what's on it. That's where you marry your dream with reality. Look at your list of things you want to grow and the animals you want to raise. Read a little bit about each animal to get an idea of how much space and care they require. Now check your farm resources. Do you have enough pastures for these five cows, or will you need to build that over time? Do you have the financial resources to buy a fence for If you plan to start an agricultural business. you want to write the entire farm business plan. Dreaming and evaluating what you just did will help you get started with statement, which is a great place to start. Farm planning is an ongoing process and work continues. The plan may be adjusted. Each season, you take your dream list from step two and pencil and paper sketch your land out of step three. Have your dreams changed? Do you have more to add, or what you now know you don't want to do? Each year sit down with your farm plan and decide what you want to tackle during the coming spring, summer and fall.
