Google's YouTube division is testing live video streaming waters with a two-day trial that starts today and offers a variety of entertainment and news content from media partners. YouTube's live streaming efforts are an ambitious first step to break into live streaming with your tools. From this Monday and Tuesday at 8 p.m., the online video giant will be live entertainment programming from four media partners. YouTube says its efforts are part of a live streaming platform pilot. YouTube can access live video content through a YouTube.com or embedded web application that can be added to a website or blog. Video programming ranges from news and entertainment from Rocketboom, training videos from Howcast, celebrity and lifestyle programming from Young Hollywood, and video destinations Other New Networks will offer a variety of programs including satire from a barely political channel. A live YouTube video channel is advertised on the YouTube homepage, which states: Today and tomorrow, we are conducting a limited test of our new live streaming platform along with the partners featured here. Watch the videos below to learn more about their events to see. Part of the service pilot includes what YouTube calls the Live Comments module, which is visible for viewers during broadcasts and allows them to chat with others and live broadcasts as they watch. YouTube also says that part of its experimental live stream platform will also include support for content from various sources. All broadcasters have a camera or an external USB/FireWire camera, according to a YouTube announcement. The move comes as Google faces increased competition from Facebook that, according to ComScore, surpassed Google as an internet destination where users spend the most time. YouTube is still the number one video destination online, but other video-oriented sites like Ustream.tv and Justin.tv are nipping at their heels. In July, comScore reported that Facebook jumped to become the third largest video destination on the internet. However, Google YouTube still doesn't have much to worry about. According to ComScore, YouTube ranked as the top online video content site on the internet with 143.2 million unique viewers, followed by Yahoo Sites with 55.1 million, and then Facebook with 46.6 million. The move also comes as Google is increasingly set to take blankets off its Google TV initiative that it says is a platform that connects to the Internet with traditional TV. Currently, YouTube is only experimenting with live streaming with certain partners. It is unclear what YouTube's upcoming live streaming plans are and whether includes the ability to use the feature for any user who is interested in web hosting. Currently, UStream and Justin.tv offer tools that make it available to the public Monday's attempt at YouTube marks the first time the company has used its tools to produce its live Webcast. In the past Google has offered broadcasts of many of its product launch events via YouTube, including streaming rock band U2 last October and President Barack Obama answered questions live on YouTube in February on Ian's Twitter (@ianpaul). Today's Celtics vs. Bucks live stream showcases Giannis Antetokounmpo's return to the court, in one of the first NBA games since everything went quiet on March 11. March 11 marked a day when the NBA went on a long break because Utah Jazz center Rudy Gobert tested positive for COVID-19. In the months that followed, the league has worked on what seems to be the safest plan to return, a bubble-only NBA for employees and players that exists at Walt Disney World in Orlando, Florida. And so far, the bubble seems to be working. The NBA yesterday (July 29) announced that for the second week in a row there were zero positive tests among 344 players inside the bubble. Fans across the country will most likely have their eyes on Antetokounmpo. He got another chance to shine when the Celtics expected to put Jaylen Brown and Jayson Tatum on try to defend against Giannis on duty - a match up that most say favored Antetokounmpo. Fans eagerly awaiting the upcoming post-season likely to use today's game as an opportunity to take on-court temperatures as the star is expected to lead the Bucks to the NBA Finals. If the Celtics win, somehow, it will be considered an upset. Yes, they're not bad, but all eyes are on Milwaukee. Even if Giannis gets held under 20, as was the case against the Cavs, the Bucks will likely pick up points as a unit, as his 6 teams matched or surpassed 14 points Antetokounmpo had in that game.
