The clinical presentation of pediatric Idiopathic Thrombocytopenic Purpura (ITP) is not specific. ITP in children often leads to severe complications if not treated properly. ITP is the most common acquired immunodeficiency syndrome in children in many geographic areas. Studies performed in the past 5 years suggest that the platelet count is a more sensitive marker of the degree of thrombocytopenia than the clinical symptoms. All patients with ITP must receive treatment. The therapy of ITP in children has progressed from the use of corticosteroids alone to treatment with high-dose intravenous immunoglobulin (IVIg) and then the use of the anti-CD-20 monoclonal antibody Rituximab (MabCampath) as a first-line therapy in patients resistant to immunosuppressive therapy. Despite the development of newer and more aggressive therapies, all children with ITP require long-term follow-up in order to monitor both the response to therapy and the complications of the disease.West Side Cabins | Bed & Breakfast This property is on a secluded farm located in a quiet, bucolic country setting.
