Some words sound very similar, but have different spellings. We call these words homophones. An example of this can be them there. While most speakers pronounce these words in the same way, these two words have very different meanings. They are shown by possession or possession. It shows the location. Knowing the difference between them and there isn't really that important when you talk, but it's very important when you write. Things can get quite confusing for readers when a writer chooses the wrong word from a set of homophones. Common basic government standards indicate that students must master the choice of words. This means that the student should be able to recognize when the word steal should be used instead of the word steel, and literally hundreds more pairs like steal and steel. So how can students prepare for this? Just as one gets to Carnegie Hall: practice, practice, practice! To help with this, I created a bunch of resources on homophones and a selection of words and posted them below. Homophones Leaf 1 - Here are 25 practice problems on homophones.
