Who's the killer in the outsider

Okay, so the season finale of The Outsider brought to an end the story of El Cuco the shape-shifting kid's cloak. And buddy, it was a doozy. If you haven't seen it yet, my god, what are you doing reading a finished piece explained? You rectify this situation immediately, because there are spoilers ahead. Now that this is out of the way, we can continue with the unpacking of this ending, and my thoughts on the possibility of a Season 2. Episode 10, entitled Must/Can't in a double reference to both the need to catch El Cuco in the cave and the danger of confronting a supernatural being that no one in our group of heroes fully understands, apparently ends up with everything resolved. The monster is killed (Ralph goes full Mendo on this thing with a big stone and I would have stood up in my living room and screamed if I hadn't arrived late on a Sunday night), Terry is exonerated by the Cherokee City District Attorney, Claude returns home from his family, Holly leaves a gift in Andy's coffin and moves on to other cases, and Ralph finally accepts his son's death with some comfort from the knowledge that a world beyond his comprehension absolutely exists. But if horror and Stephen King, in particular, have taught me anything over the years, it's to be completely suspicious of a happy ending to Uber. And my suspicions were confirmed when the credits were interrupted with an epilogue of Holly in a hotel room somewhere in Central America. The image via HBO Holly has a vision of Jack Hoskins, the monster puppet turned fucking monster, in the bathroom mirror, and immediately checks the back of his neck for any sign of the bulls indicating the influence of El Cuco. She seems to be comforted by the results, but it's important to note that we don't actually get to see her neck - it's completely obscured by shade. He then moves into the room and looks at the murder of Frankie Peterson to see that Terry Maitland has been exonerated. The episode ends with the camera slowly turning away from Holly as she anxiously turns her hair around, a prominent scratch visible on her forearm. The end is deliberately ambiguous and open to interpretation, which is something the internet absolutely hates (Google Start End to see what I'm talking about). There are two possibilities – one, that Holly is imagining seeing Jack in his bathroom and is only checking the case that fundamentally changed his life; or two, who is under the influence of El Cuco and is checking to see exactly what the authorities know about her as she slowly recovers in the cave and transforms into Holly. There is evidence to support any conclusions. It has been established that Holly suffers from PTSD, so the appearance of Jack in her mirror could only be a symptom of experienced in the shooting in front of the cave. However, just before Ralph crushes the monster monster pulls a T-1000 and transforms into a bunch of people, including the head of Ralph Yunis and Holly, who seems to indicate that he can imitate anyone, but can only completely duplicate a person when he collects some of his DNA. That means it could have been someone at any time, and although we never see monster Claude scratch Holly, other members of the group certainly got the chance. It is entirely possible that El Cuco imitated Yunis, or Ralph, or anyone else, and scratched his arm to collect his sweet and sweet genetic material for nefarious change purposes. It's kind of up to you to decide which explanation is most plausible, though the show throws an extra key at everything when El Cuco admits it has no idea if it's a single being or part of a breed of creatures, which means there could be more of them out there. (The show advises us more in this direction in Episode 9, when the Cherokee City D.A. learns that another mutilated child was discovered by a hiker, and we know that our El Cuco hasn't been able to successfully kill more children since poor Frankie.) Image via HBO Now, regarding the possibility of outsider season 2, I think it's entirely likely. Although the show was initially billed as a miniseries, it does the job of paving the way for a possible second season. First, Must/Can't is very visibly labeled as a season finale rather than a series finale. Obviously, this could mean absolutely nothing, as evidenced by the title To Be Continued at the end of the final episode of A. L.F., but it's worth noting that HBO is apparently at least open to the possibility of extending The Outsider. Second, there are Ralph's words to Holly, in which he points out that they make a great team and would be interested in pairing with her again in the future. He also blankly asks his point, What else is out there? Now that he's open to the idea of the supernatural, he's curious about what other monsters and entities might be hoping to receive the business end of Full Mendo, and I'm not opposed to Holly and Ralph going all Mulder and Scully in a bunch of gremlins for several more seasons. Finally, as Holly herself explains, the title of the show The Outsider refers to both her and the monster, so Holly Gibney's Adventures could easily fall under the banner of The Outsider. The Outsider was based on a single novel, but Holly has appeared in some of King's books, as well as the audience series Mr. Mercedes, in which the character is played by Justine Lupe. So the idea of having Holly as a recurring character in a mystery series is clearly something King intended. In addition, there are precedents for spinning a miniseries in a regular show - Dexter, by Michael C. Hall as a serial killer serial killer, began as a one-novel adaptation in first season, but went on to become its own story, completely separate from any source material. I think a season 2 depends entirely on how many people enjoyed this initial offer, and I'm fully excited about the prospect of seeing Ben Mendelsohn and Cynthia Erivo hunt Frankensteins and werewolves for years to come. The novel was published by Scribner. [2] Plot In Flint City, Oklahoma, police detective Ralph Anderson arrests popular English teacher and Little League coach Terry Maitland in front of a crowd of baseball spectators. Maitland is charged with the rape and mutilation of 11-year-old Frankie Peterson. Maitland hires his friend and lawyer, Howie Gold, to help him. However, Detective Anderson has eyewitnesses and forensic evidence that clearly points to Maitland as the main, and only, suspect. Meanwhile, eager reporters harass Maitland's wife Marcy and their two daughters, Sarah and Grace. [3] District Attorney Bill Samuels urges Anderson to break Maitland's alibi in order to make this an open and closed case. Anderson discovers that several eyewitnesses confirm that Maitland was out of town, at a writers' conference in a neighboring town, when the murder was committed. Security footage from the conference also provides confirmation of Maitland's alibi. Anderson actually finds a book in the conference center gift shop that Maitland (or his doppelgänger) collected and the fingerprints left in the book are confirmed to be from Maitland. Samuels encourages Anderson to destroy this new evidence, but Anderson does not. Despite evidence showing that Maitland was in two places at once, Anderson still believes Maitland was going the young man. Maitland, who has been awaiting trial in prison, is taken to the courthouse, where he is shot to death by the victim's older brother, Ollie Peterson. Ollie is later shot and killed by Detective Anderson. Anderson is then placed on administrative, administrative leave, the district attorney decides not to seek re-election. With the help of private investigator, Holly Gibney, Marcy Maitland and Howie Gold follow a trail of clues in Marysville, Texas. Detective Anderson, following the group, is also heading to Texas. Jack Hoskins, Anderson's rival in local law enforcement, is coerced by the Outsider (i.e. the real killer) to kill Detective Anderson. The Outsider promises Hoskins that if he kills Anderson, he will cure himself of his cancer. With the help of a number of characters, including police officers and a possible Outsider victim, both Anderson and Gibney discover they have a real monster on their hands. They set about destroying the Outsider in a large cave in Marysville, where two children had died years earlier. [3] Holly is able to hit the Outsider with a happy slap (a sock full of ball bearings, similar to the gun she used to stop Brady Hartsfield in King's novel, Mr. Mercedes), apparently killing the Outsider. Later, Samuels holds a press conference clearing Maitland, alleging faulty DNA samples and confirming the conference center's video proof supporting Maitland's alibi. Background information The novel was first mentioned in an interview by USA Today on August 7, 2017. [4] The cover of the book was first revealed on January 18, 2018. [5] An excerpt was released on May 25, 2018, issue of Entertainment Weekly. [6] Reception Review aggregator Book Marks' website reported that 10 of the 14 critics gave The Outsider a rave review, while the remaining four expressed positive impressions, meaning the novel received critical acclaim. [7] Television adaptation Main article: The Outsider (miniseries) In June 2018, it was announced that Media Rights Capital had optioned the novel to be produced as a 10-part miniseries scripted by Richard Price, and executive producers Jack Bender and Marty Bowen. [8] On December 3, 2018, he was cast in the HBO series, starring Ben Mendelsohn as Ralph Anderson,[9] along with Jason Bateman, Paddy Considine, Cynthia Erivo, Bill Camp and Mare Winningham. Julianne Nicholson, Yul Vazquez, Jeremy Bobb and Marc Menchaca will appear as regulars, with Hettienne Park and Michael Esper about to repeat themselves.
