By Christina Sloan Updated September 28, 2017 Cell phones contain personal information such as text messages, photos, videos, graphics and phone or used it without your permission, you may have turned on your password protection. When password protection is enabled on your mobile phone, the phone cannot be used to receive or receive or receive text messages and calls until you wither your four-digit code and make a few attempts. Users usually create their own codes, so try using numbers such as the year of birth or the last four digits of your phone number if you still can't remember your code. These numbers are sometimes used by service providers as default unlocking codes. Click OK after each attempt. Using a friend's phone or a phone box, contact your service provider if you still can't unlock your phone. Tamara Runzel Many mobile phones now hold more than just a contact list of phone numbers. Smartphones can store emails and appointment calendars, send emails, browse the Internet, and sync with your computer. One way to protect information on your phone is to have a password or lock code. This prevents anyone who does not know the code from accessing your personal information. While a password is a good security measure, it can also be a hassle if you forget the code. If you are locked out of your phone, you can try several options depending on the model you have. Enter the last four digits of your phone number. Unlock codes for most phones are originally installed on these numbers, although most service providers have you change it shortly after buying the phone. Try 1234 if your phone is still locked. This is a common unlock code for many models. Enter 0000 as another opportunity. This is another common code that can work for a phone model. Go online to the service provider's website and enter an email address if it's connected to your phone. If your phone has the ability to email, the service provider sometimes sends you a new code via email. Call your service provider sometimes sends you a new code via email. Call your service provider if none of the above codes work and you still can't remember your password. They it's for you and will give you a new code. If you've previously blocked Word, withdraw Password protection is a fairly simple process, provided you're signed in as the document holder. Depending on the platform, repeat the steps in the tutorial above until you've returned to the Security Document. Choose DK to unlock the document. Go to the Review tab and select the protection document. Remove passwords or passwords from the fields provided. Choose OK to unlock the documents. Ok guys, I know this sounds a bit weird, but I want to have only one user (or one username) with two different passwords, with each password logging into another account (using the same username). What I could have done so far was to create another user and change some settings as this guide shows that the username and different passwords? Any software? Or settings or something like that? Thank you! Overall, it would be a lot of effort for very little profit. All your friend really needs to do is create two or more accounts, one with his name, and one for the family (or a separate one for each family member). families).
