For my list of Steam games, the games were removed from my Steam account and then re-added. Overall though, I think it's a great step forward for Blizzard, as well as for UPlay. It's interesting that they go for a game that's not even out yet, and are relying on word of mouth to get people to download it. Steam for Windows - Most users will have this Battle.net for Windows - Most PC owners will have this UPlay - Most Steam users will have this. Only on Mac and Linux users will need to download from the developers website Blizzard has also said that they're currently looking at ways to allow LAN game play with friends on their own XBox 360, which could open up an interesting world of possibilities, especially if the graphics are similar to that of the Nintendo Wii. They have also mentioned the option of allowing the game to be played over the internet, but currently that's still in the experimental stage. It's yet to be seen how this new system will affect all of the multiplayer servers that are set up for Warcraft III. There's also the question of whether the windows version will offer any other features that UPlay doesn't offer. Hopefully we'll get more information on Blizzard's MMO expansion World of Warcraft: The Burning Crusade before long.

UPDATE - More information on the Uplay website - UPlay: get up to two friends to play with over the internet and there's a bit more information in the FAQ section Warcraft III is a strategy role-playing game set during the Third Age of the Orcish Empire. It is one of the most successful strategy games on the PC platform, and has sold over six million copies. Blizzard has been working on Warcraft III: The Frozen Throne for several years, and when it's released it will be one of the most expensive games ever. Warcraft III: The Frozen Throne takes place on the epic landscape of Northrend. You can read the official strategy guide here. The player is able to play as the Orc faction during the war and attempt to liberate the frozen areas of Northrend from the Forsaken. The game also features special modes that include: Arena - A mode in which one team plays against another team in the same faction, and the two teams must control three points at the start of the game. Warcraft III: Reforged - A mode in which the player can switch their 520fdb1ae7
