Basic life support for healthcare providers student manual pdf

Adam K. Ozialko has passed almost two dozen centuries since Hippocrates, The Father of Western Medicine, walked the Earth; However, his famous quote: Let food be your medicine and medicine be your food ring truer than ever. Among the epidemic rates of chronic disease and obesity plaguing the United States, more and more people are demanding a healthy diet and lifestyle. Americans have expressed interest in local and organic food, but access to truly organic and locally produced food is often limited. Many of the large agricultural enterprises that dominate the market rely on monocultural food production and solid sales of food and manufacturing. For the consumer, connecting with local and regional farmers - literally knowing where their food is coming from - finding healthy, natural food can be a herculean task. One medical practice, Ethos Health, aims to help through the embrace of local, organic foods and medical diets. Credit: Adam C. Uzialko Located between two lush, hills in Long Valley, N.J., Ethos Health is a real Eden Garden dotted with the remains of elderly buildings at various stages of rehabilitation. Led by founder Dr. Ron Weiss, Ethos Health distinguishes itself from other medical practices in a major reason - it is located on 342 acres of prime farmland, where organic growers raise and harvest patients' prescribed diets. Weiss argues that a healthy diet and a healthy lifestyle not only prevents the formation of chronic diseases, but also reverses them and mitigate adverse effects. Trying to start a private medical practice? That's what you need. Ethos Health has evolved as a reaction to expensive medications and procedures based on the American health care system, which for the most part ... Provides health care that supports people in chronic conditions, Weiss told Business News Daily, adding that the CDC estimates that 86 percent of the $3.2 trillion spent on health care in 2016 were paid for chronic disease treatment. By contrast, Weiss said, Ethos Health's focus is on preventing and reversing chronic diseases through its farm-based health system that links human health in the natural world and promotes the fundamental connections that exist between all living things. Credit: Adam C. Uzialko In its current form, the farm is a small part of the ultimate vision. Approximately 80 acres of property remains unproductive, while 100 acres leased to a commercial farmer focus more on traditional agricultural methods to increase huge monocultures of soybeans and corn. If the Etas model is successful, Weiss envisions a weighted, gradual expansion in which young farmers are given the tools and resources to succeed, all while promoting a sustainable, organic mission. On the agriculture side, he said, our vision is to develop a joint union of young young giving them our land for growth, teaching them sustainable farming techniques and offering them technical assistance. The 12-acre subdivision of the charming property, which is home to some of the most productive soils in New Jersey, features an organic farm cultivation operation. This piece of land boasts a variety of products and flowers, as well as local wild herbs designed to attract native insects and fauna. Nora Pugliese, farm manager for Ethos Health, oversees agricultural operations and adheres to strict guidelines for organic growing - even with the aim of going beyond the rules to provide a truly organic product. Pugliese, a former CSA Stone's Throw Garden manager, joked with a friend - who first told her about Weiss's project - that she would find this doctor and become a farm manager. Two years later, she contacted Weiss for a lecture he had given in the nearby Middle Valley. Today she is in her fourth season of Farm Management, which helps maintain the well-being of her patients, some of whom suffer from chronic diseases that have improved dramatically since they started the program. The ethos is much more than a place to grow a healthy diet; it is also a community meeting place with yoga classes, lunches and educational programs. Importantly, Pugliese said, is to encourage people to transition to a healthy lifestyle supporting the community to strengthen and test the progress they are making. The farm offers educational programs to help patients switch to whole foods, plant-based diets and lifestyles... because it takes time to do it, Pugliese said. They need support along the way, they need support and they need to meet other people who join them along the way. They need to understand why this is important to their health, the health of their communities and the environment around them, she added. Photo: Adam C. Uzialko In addition, Ethos also offers one month of clinical rotations for medical students and physicians wanting to learn more about natural practices. The ethos of primary medical practice is not only a primary care home for patients, but serves as an educational institution for medical students, interns and residents, and even practitioners who seek to learn how to reverse and prevent chronic diseases with lifestyle changes, Weiss said. Weiss noted that the farm also offers vegetable cooking classes, utility dishes, fortune pot, fitness classes, nature walks in collaboration with NJ Audubon and farm products for sale at the Farm Market Doctor, both for Ethos Primary Care Patients and the public. The long-term vision, Weiss said, is that Ethos Health a model that can be reproduced and expanded as far and wide as possible. The organization's mission is not only to develop a successful business, but also to transition to local, organic and good health based on mindfulness, lifestyle and nature. As the current American health care system becomes more unstable... I see a bright future for Ethos Health as a sustainable model for providing true health care, growing food and not only protecting but also renewing the land, Weiss said. Our long-term growth will result from the creation of a strong team of primary care physicians, nurses and other health care providers. The team will do everything from helping new parents in the birth of healthy children to help the elderly live a rich, quality, disease-free life and come out of the world in a dignified way without withholding resources from future generations. Through the development of clinical and agricultural programs, particularly educational programs aimed at young doctors and farmers, Ethos Health is investing in the future of its model. If successful, organic surgery from farm to clinic can become self-procurement and repetitive, which is the ultimate goal. And if successful, Ethos Healthcare will pioneer a new business model and a new lifestyle in line with economic, environmental and medical imperatives.
