Not only do they share your passion for Netflix and cat videos, but they are always down to talk about what's on your mind. And hey, they even share their sense of humor (well, sometimes). A recent study published in Nature Communications says the reason for this similarity is that best friends actually have similar - and sometimes identical - brain activity. Yes, your closest friends get you because it's like them basically looking in the mirror. The study, conducted at Dartmouth College, initially had 279 students complete a survey about friendship. From there, they studied the brain activity of 42 students when they watched the old videos. The video included clips from America's Funniest Home Videos and CNN Crossfire, as well as footage of an astronaut on the International Space Station and a wedding ceremony. The MRI showed that the closer friends - in terms of relationships, not proximity - the closer the brain activity. The same areas of the brain - associated with motivation, attention and judgment - caught fire with close friends. From the results, the researchers were even able to predict which participants were friends - and their guesses were spot on. People who responded more similarly to the videos shown in the experiment were more likely to be closer together in their shared social network, and these were significant even while controlling the inter-ethnic similarities in the variables such as age, gender, nationality and ethnicity, the authors write. The study raises a bigger question: Do people initially look for friends who are just like them? Or do friends become more similar over time? We believe both are happening, author Adam Kleinbaum told Business Insider. But the authors are not concerned about these trends. In fact, they believe that this is a good thing because having close friends with similar brain activities can be beneficial because it strengthens their own values, opinions and interests. So, what happens next? Plan a movie night with your closest friends and see how you are in sync. I bet you'll both be rolling on the floor with laughter or roaring eyes, because apparently that's what your best friends do. I decided not to over-stuff this so that the tentacles remain floppy so as to grab my head. Fold the rear edges of the opening over then pin the hole closed. Using a needle and a green thread, sew up the hole closed, as shown, tucking the thread ends into the body. With a needle and green thread, sew a thread on a small piece of wool the size of a penny. In the center of the underbelly, inside the pocket, squeeze the body flat and press the needle all the way through the body, going as close to the top of the head as possible. Pull the thread tight until the tentacles hang and look like a Pac-Man ghost (yes without antennnas it can be used to make those as well). Hand stitch at the top to lock it in place. Now that each panel is made up of a heavier caliber paper, I can start working on cut lines, folded lines, sewing lines and seam allowance. To attach the panels to each other I need to add extra material around the contour of the surface panels that have been created so far. You have to figure out how you want to collect and in what order you want to assemble your creation. Hopefully you've been thinking about this since you first started running a possible seam line. If you are like me and you are more comfortable with building cars than sewing fabric or leather, I highly recommend that you take some instructable classes. Specifically, from Michaela Holmes, such as Lesson 2: Making Leather Patterns in Her Intermediate Working Class Skin. She does a tremendous job of explaining these topics and more. So, go get :).There that you graduate and have some idea of how to collect your creation, let's apply this knowledge to the final template to make a move. Make-up and tape tape surface pattern panels on a new sheet of copy paper. Slightly trace the contour of the surface of the panel to a new sheet of paper. Use a compass and pencil to mark the contour of the seam manual (photo 54). I made my seam allowance 3/4 wide because I have thumbs and it's hard for me to work with narrow fields. Adjust the surcharge to what is convenient for you. Once I have a light compass trace seam manual, I un-tape the surface of the panel and flip it upside down onto another sheet of copy paper. I then tap it onto this sheet and make a reverse or mirrored copy for the left side of the styro head. As shown in Photo 54, I used dash lines to contour the surface of the panels and hard lines for the entire cutout (including the seam allowance). Then I do notation how to fold and/or which panels are nearby, if that's not obvious. You can also use different computer programs to finish the templates. With methods such as scanning the panels after step 17, then import them as a vector file into the CAD program. You can then use bezier's vector points and lines to clear the scissors of bumps on the curves and make seam aids by ripping the surface and then zooming up the copy. A bit of editing and you have a real electronic template. electronic template. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide pdf. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide (10th anniversary updated for java 8). head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide pdf github. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide 2nd edition. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide pdf download free. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide free pdf. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide - 10th anniversary edition. head first design patterns a brain-friendly guide by eric freeman
