The original prototype that inspired early inspirations. In addition, it can be seen on the front-end (slider), in the middle of the credits (disc), as well as the arcade cabinet. Tropic (1987). Another Game (1987). The game cartridge design, even more the artwork, was the most important factor that made the Arcade stand out from many other games. Pillar of the (1987) Shouryu Chouden Kanaburacho (1987). Jigoku no Gojoe (1987) (1987). For the first time in the history of the Game Industry, the developer was able to create something unique in two dimensions. The first Dinosaur King Arcade was shown in late 1987, only in a few demo rooms. It was limited to two pre-installed titles, and it was available only in Japan. The dinosaur king arcade was a quick-hit-good-fans-style-of-a-game that was the perfect mix of all that is good about arcade games and the original motivations. The games were called "Jurassic Park" and "Kill the dinosaurs." With a release schedule that was very much compressed, the arcade went out of business before there was a full-fledged video arcade version. Ichiro Kitagawa was the author and illustrator of all the game graphics. It was his sole occupation at the time, but as he was working for Konami in the future he decided to stay with the game until the end. He received orders from Konami to create a digital version of the games for the GameBoy. Being an early prototype for the GameBoy port, it has some special features and original artwork. The images were created using a C-128 computer and a ZX Spectrum, with a ZX-81 keyboard. The GameBoy port was published in 1989, and was released at the same time as the PC version in Western countries, though it was one year behind Japan. The GameBoy version was only given four different layouts. The cabinet was made to resemble the original arcade cabinet and it is interesting to note that the screen does not fill the entirety of the game area. A word of advice from a personal experience, I have seen how a small shelf is a very convenient thing 520fdb1ae7
