Chick fil a corporate w2 forms online

Whether you have to pay additional taxes when you file your tax return this year or you're already planning how you'll spend an anticipated tax refund, the arrival of your Form W-2, "Wage and Tax Statement," pushes you one step closer to either outcome. As an hourly wage-earner or salaried employee, you rely on your employer to send you a W-2. There are numerous reasons why you may not receive a W-2 from a former employer, but you have strategies for obtaining it. Tips Losing your W-2 isn't a catastrophe. If you have misplaced your W-2 from a former employer or did not receive one at all, your first step should be to contact them directly and ask for a copy. In the event that you cannot make contact, you should notify the IRS of your issue and seek their assistance. Your former employer may be "former" because you moved too far away to continue your employment there. Even if you filled out a change-of-address form at your local U.S. Post Office to have your mail forwarded, your W-2 may have gotten lost in the shuffle. You may have simply found another job. Or you may not be working for your former employer because the company is no longer in business. Regardless of the reason you didn't receive a W-2, track it down by first going to the source – your former employer. Although most taxpayers receive their W-2 forms by the end of January, you may not receive yours until February. IRS tax law imposes a January 31 deadline by which an employer must furnish W-2 forms to employees either directly or by mail. If your employer mails W-2s on the deadline date, allowing for timely delivery through the U.S. postal mail service means you should receive your W-2 in early February. If the first week in February has come and gone, contact your employer and request a duplicate form. Confirm that the employer has your correct mailing address before asking that the form be mailed to you. If your former employer's place of business is within driving distance, you can also ask the employer to provide a duplicate form to pick up at the place of business. If your employer does not produce your W-2 form, or if you cannot contact your employer because the company is no longer in business, ask the IRS to intervene. If you do not receive your W-2 by February 15, the IRS will contact your former employer on your behalf to request it. Call the IRS at 800-829-1040 to give this information: Your name, address, phone number and Social Security Number Your former employer's name, address and phone number Your dates of employment Your estimated yearly tax that was withheld, which you'll see on your final pay stub Even if you do not receive your W-2 before the tax filing deadline, you must still file your tax return on time. Attach Form 4852, "Substitute for Form W-2, Wage and Tax Statement," to your tax return. You'll estimate your missing W-2 information on this form. You can also file an extension by using Form 4868, "Application for Automatic Extension of Time to File U.S. Individual Income Tax Return." Download both these forms from the IRS website at IRS.gov. If you receive your W-2 after you file your tax return, and the estimated information you submitted on Form 4852 differs from the actual information on your W-2, you'll need to correct your tax return. File an amended tax return by using Form 1040X, "Amended U.S. Individual Income Tax Return." What Would You Like to Name Your Corporation? What People Are Saying Featured In Online forms allow you an easy way to gather information from current and potential customers. Some forms require answer boxes be checked, while others allow for written responses. Using these forms can provide you with the information needed to make data-driven marketing decisions. This article is for small business owners and marketing professionals who want to know more about online forms and the benefits they offer. Every company needs the right data to make better business decisions. You can easily collect data from customers, prospects, and leads by creating and distributing an online form that provides you with information to help you make data-driven decisions.Writing, designing, and implementing online forms is simple with the right tool and some effort. There are numerous available tools for creating online forms that can feed data into your existing business systems.Here's what you need to know about creating, using and analyzing online forms to improve your business.What is the purpose of online forms?Chances are, you've filled out a few online surveys. Perhaps it was a registration form, an order form or a custom form on a specific topic. They are often simple questionnaires seamlessly integrated into a company's website. If you've ever purchased something online and typed in your credit card information, you've used an online form.An online form is an interactive web page or HTML form that allows the user to input information. Once they hit the Submit button, their form responses are sent to servers for processing, where it can be analyzed and evaluated.There are different types of online forms that can appear in various places on your websites. The most common is a text box, which can ask a simple question and then the user types in their response. These fillable forms can be placed on any page on a website and ask as few or as many questions as you'd like. If you're not looking for open-ended responses, your online form can use check boxes for multiple-choice questions, drop-down menus and submit buttons.Where you place and promote your online form is up to you. However, you should put it in a location that is visible and will get the most responses.Key takeaway: Online forms are simple questionnaires that you place on your website to gather feedback from you customers. How businesses benefit from online formsOnline forms are an efficient and organized way for businesses to collect data about their customers. Because you're creating and publishing the online forms yourself, the questions are objective and original to you and the information you're trying to learn. The data collected comes straight from the source, so it's accurate, and because most forms are responsible across mobile devices and tablets, it's easily accessible. These forms can not only capture the data that is directly submitted with them, but they can capture details on how customers are interacting with the page on which the form is embedded. Once you've accumulated these measurements, you can take this information to your team and make analytic-driven marketing decisions.Key takeaway: Online forms allow you to ask visitors to your website objective questions that can help you make informed decisions about how to effectively target them.Your online form should consist of one or more questions, where users can either type out a response or select an option from a menu. As mentioned above, the most common types of online forms include text boxes, drop-down lists, check boxes, radio buttons and feedback messages.The questions you ask should be simple, concise, and they should be easy to understand. Don't use too many words when a few will do. Additionally, don't use complicated language when simple words convey the same meaning.While your first instinct may be to ask several questions to get as much information about your customers as possible, consider exactly what you're looking for. When you have an excess of data, it's difficult to zero in on what you need.People aren't going to want to spend a lot of time filling out your form, so make it as quick to complete as possible. To make the process painless for users, ask questions that can typically be responded to through their web browser's autofill, such as their name, email address, location and phone number. The less time a user has to spend on filling your form out, the more likely they are to respond to it."Capture only what you need in the order of how badly you need it," said Spencer Fry, founder of Podia. "For example, if a customer is purchasing [an online product], the first thing we need is their payment information. A credit card number, expiration date and security code are all that we ask for in our checkout form." The company will only ask for further information, such as an email address or password, after they have received a customer's credit card information."Asking for too much information upfront can be overwhelming," Fry said. "To streamline the process, break it down into steps that build on each other."Key takeaway: Online forms should have clear questions. Only ask questions you think will provide valuable insight. Asking too many questions can be a turnoff and lead people to not answer any of them. How to create an online formThere are many free and paid online form builders you can use to create them for your website and integrate them into your marketing automation workflow. While the layouts, features and workflow all vary to different degrees, the steps to create an online form are generally the same with every program: Create a new form. Regardless of which form builder you use, you start by creating a new form. In most cases, you can create one from scratch or modify a prebuilt template. Edit and format your new form. Next, you'll edit your form by adding fields to it. These can be preset or custom fields. Once you've decided what type of form you want to use, write your questions and responses out. It helps to do this in a word processing document in case you ever need to come back to the original form. Test your form. Double-check to make sure your form works on multiple web browsers and devices. Fill out and submit the form through your non-default web browsers and phone, so you can ensure users' responses go through regardless of how they submit them. Send or publish your form. Once you've reviewed your form and everything looks clean, it's time to send your form out to the masses. You can publish it as a web page on your site or include it in an email to customers and clients. Key takeaway: You can build an online form from scratch or use a template. Be sure to edit and test it before sending it out or publishing it.A great online form builder should be simple, intuitive and easy to customize. Here are a few of the best free and paid online form builders you can use to create your own forms. Google Forms: Google Forms is free and easy to use; it only requires a Google account to use. It saves all of your information into Google Sheets spreadsheets for your analysis. They also have premade templates in case you aren't sure how you want to format your online form.
