[7] Background Main Article: Black Dahlia In 1947, Elizabeth Short, known as the Black Dahlia, was brutally murdered. [1] The murder remains undetected; George Hodel, a surgeon, was, however, one of the primary suspects. After George Hodel's death in 1999, his son, Steve Hodel, a former suicide detective at the Los Angeles County Police Department, learned more about his father and discovered information that led him to believe that George Hodel was the killer of the Black Dahlia. [8] The podcast is presented by Hodel's great-granddaughters, Yvette Heiden and Rasha Pecoraro, the daughters of Fauna Hodel. Throughout the podcast, the sisters interview their family, discuss 70 years of family history, and reveal the ways in which the family changes to the Black Dahlia case. After her death in September 2017, Fauna Hodel's daughters began sorting through the things she left behind. In the podcast, pacific and Pecoraro analyzed audio recordings between Fauna and her mother, Tamar, George's daughter. Pacific and Pecoraro also reflect on the weight the Hodel name bears. [10] This is the first time that the family members have spoken publicly about their past. [11] [12] Heiden and Pecoraro believe that they killed grandfather Elizabeth Short. I just finished the last episode and my immediate tendent was to start over from the beginning. I went into this pod curious about the Hodel family and Fauna's story, but skeptical about George Hodel as the killer of the Black Dahlia. Root of Evil does provide more evidence of George's guilt and gruesome of Elizabeth Short's murder as I heard or read elsewhere, but at heart is still this gripping family drama that alternately amazes you and breaks your heart. I was fascinated by all the small details of each family member. So good! Good job! I thought it was another Black Dahlia documentary, but it really got through so much more! Crazy to think it's still undetected, but it also shares how damaged this family is of a horrible person. Person.
