He graduated with honors from Columbia, New York and Yale, and worked as a professor at the University of Miami. He was head of the psychiatric area at Mount Sinai Hospital in Miami Beach. In 2002, he was a psychiatrist at Bellevue University in New York and served as director of the psychiatric ward at Mount Sinai Hospital. Regression therapy During his psychiatric practice, he researched and developed methodologies for working regression to past lives. He made this regression experience in more than four thousand patients at his office in Miami, Florida. Remembering traumatic situations from the past helps heal injuries, this method is very similar to psychoanalysis. The existence of past lives can be confirmed, in cases that show characteristics such as: that people speak foreign languages who have never studied or heard xenoglosia; who have found in this life children that they had in a previous life, and these children confirm the experience. Other cases that can be proven in practice when, during regression, they mention specific data or details (places, dates, names) of which they knew nothing, which can then be found. He is the author of several works related to love and faith in reincarnation, the latter came up through the experience narrated by his patients in a state of mental hypnosis, attending the birth of regressive therapy of past lives. His dissertation has caused controversy in the scientific community. His detractors - mostly other doctors such as Steven Novella and David Gorski, or James Randi category skeptics - criticized his beliefs for moving away from the academy. Brian Weiss is a regular guest on national programs in the U.S. such as Oprah, Coast to Coast AM, Larry King Live, and 20/20. He develops workshops at the Omega Holistic Research Institute in New York.
