Before we start discussing various tools to help you find your loved ones, let's make it clear that you need to have some important identification information on hand to do so. This information includes:The full name of the law of your loved ones (first, middle, and last)Date of Birth They State that they are being held inNote that some tools may suggest or require additional information from you about your loved ones, depending on the individual circumstances As we pass through this list, we will explain this information, and where it applies. Now, for prisoner location tools. As we said, the BOP search tool only shows results for federal prisoners. To find prisoners who are being detained in local prisons or state prisons, you will want to use the state government website where your loved one is located. While we won't take you through the step-by-step process of finding prisoners in each state, let's take a look at some examples: here's what you need if your loved ones are imprisoned in New York: Notice that the Department ID Number or New York State ID Number is meant to be used on your own. In other words, if you include one of these numbers, you don't have to enter the name and birth year of the prisoner. Similarly, in search of prisoners in California, you have to include either their full legal name or their Inmate Number if you know: While most states provide the ability to find prisoners on their government's official website, others use third-party search tools, which we'll discuss in the next section. The Bureau of Prisons allows you to search for federal prisoner databases to find your loved ones and to disclose their contact information. Note that this database only includes prisoners held in federal prisons – we'll get to smaller prisons and prisons for a while. The BOP database also includes information about prisoners who have been released, since 1982. When using the BOP search tool, you can search for prisoners by name or by identification number. First, let's find a prisoner using their name: Again, finding a common name without any additional information leads to a large number of search results. Also, note that the The engine limits the number of results to 100 – meaning a group of other prisoners by the name of John Smith don't even appear. Obviously, it's unlikely that you're going to have this problem, but it's definitely good to know. At any rate, you can also downsize your search by entering your race, age, and gender of your loved ones. Since this search tool doesn't offer any advanced search features, you may need to include this information to see less than 100 search results. You can also find a federal prisoner using several different identification numbers, such as: BOP Register Number CDC NUMBER NUMBER NUMBER NUMBER INS NUMBER BECAUSE this identification number, of course, belongs exclusively to your loved ones, using this method is the best way to generate the right results from the BOP website.
