files As most of you know, I have been working on a tool that decodes elf files. I have gotten very close to the end of the project. I was hoping to publish a new version today, but for some reason my project files keep deleting and I can't recover them. Anyways, the reason I mention this is that I have a 10.1 patch for elf files that I got from this forum. I would like to know if there are any advantages to using this patch over 10.0 and if there is anything that would indicate that I am doing something wrong. For those that don't know, I am a java guy by day and I have little to no idea about hex and binary files. It took me almost a week to figure out how to read the hex files. Anyways, this is the patch file I used: Hi Kim, The compiler patch is already included with the codebreaker SDK. If you are compiling for Windows, then go to the \bin directory and do a grep codebreaker_win.exe * and look for the.exe file which has the compiler patch. Or, if you have the Linux SDK, then you can go to the \bin directory and you should see two files, a.exe file and a.patch file. The .patch file will contain the compiler patch. I didn't notice until now that there was a 10.2 beta available. I have a question for you. When I run the decompiler, it automatically goes to the 10.1 version of the compiler. I assume I need to tell the decompiler what version to use. How do I do that? Thanks. Re: codebreaker 10.1 patched elf files Yea, I didn't know there was a beta for it. I should probably find the beta and try it, because I would hate to get the 10.1 patch and find out that the 10.2 beta doesn't support it. I thought that the SDK that comes with the SDK came with a compiler patch as well. The SDK that I have right now is the 10.0 SDK. I just downloaded the beta SDK to check. I'll download the beta SDK in a bit and see if the patch is in there. The thing is that the SDK comes with a compiler patch, but I don't see a .patch file anywhere in the SDK. I guess it's like you said 520fdb1ae7
