Medicine. Summary of Research: James S. Comstock, PhD, director of the Molecular Pharmacology and Development Center at the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH). Summary of Research: This application outlines plans for a molecular analysis of dopamine receptor subtypes from the dog. This proposal specifically focuses on dopamine receptors in the human brain. Emmerich of Lauenburg Emmerich (died about 1184) was a member of the Lubeck noble family of the House of Lübeck and Archbishop of Magdeburg in 1180-84. Life Emmerich was a son of Arnold I of Lübeck (d. about 1150) and Sophia (d. about 1168), the daughter of Otto I, Duke of Saxony and Adelaide, the daughter of Henry I of England. Emmerich was educated in Lübeck and came from a great patrimonial line of Lubeck nobility. In 1174, he joined his father in Hungary, where Arnold was the Duke of Styria. They were probably his father's vassals, and Arnold provided him with valuable military experience. After the death of his father, Emmerich succeeded to the possessions in Lower Lusatia and the town of Lubeck. In 1178, he traveled to Rome where he was given the pallium and ordained a bishop in 1180. While in Rome he met King Henry II of England, who gave him the bishopric of Magdeburg. The reason for the move to Magdeburg is uncertain, though it may have been related to disputes with his stepbrother Bernard of Saxe-Lauenburg. Emmerich was a follower of the Hohenstaufen and was present when Otto of Brunswick defeated his half-brother Philip of Swabia in the Battle of Dornitz on 27 July 1182. For that reason, Otto, who owed him many favours, had him appointed to the vacant archbishopric of Magdeburg. Emmerich joined the Council of the Bishopric of Magdeburg in 1182 and became a member of the powerful Lotharingian Consistory in 1184. He died in Magdeburg in 1184. Emmerich had three sons: Arnold II of Lübeck, Henry, who became Archbishop of Bremen, and Emicho, who became the abbot of St. Maximin's Abbey in Trier. References 520fdb1ac7
