Origin On April 4, 2003, klipsch.com community forum user kenratboy created a thread called LOOK AT THIS WOLF SPIDER!!!, in which he posted three photos taken in Darwin, Northern Territory, Australia.The first depicted a zoomed out view of a large hunter spider and shows its size in relation to a nearby window, the second depicting the clock with the spider's visible legs underfoot underfoot , and the third showed up close the spider. On June 22, 2003, Urban Dictionary user dj gs68 created a record for Clock Spider. The first YTMND page related to Spider Clock was created on August 7, 2005. Search interest There are currently no videos available. + Add a comment The Clock Spider is a widely known spider hunter who was probably found by someone visiting a relative's house when he suddenly noticed the leg of a huge spider that was eyeing out from one side under the wall clock. He managed to take three photos before he ran out of the house terrified fucking. The first pic is from the clock on the wall where you can see the spider's feet sticking out. The second picture shows a spider on the wall after removing the clock. It's not clear how they removed the clock or just hit them with something, or the spider just moved out from behind. The third and scariest photo is a close up of a giant spider where you can actually see its fur. According to some legend, which may or may not be confirmed, the spider used to have nine legs, but lost one while fighting limecat and won! Become a legend from that moment on and be nicknamed god. You fools think the spider of the clock will have mercy on your souls? Think again. The spider will judge anyone who does not worship him as a limecat who fights him, but soon became his food. The clock spider will see us all on doomsday. Or something like that. There are other rumors that the spider will send all its worshippers huge pieces of cheese on doomsday, but when that day comes, is it more likely that it will eat all the cheese along the way, so it's not good? Check out the spooky pictures of the spider clock below. Here's the first picture showing the legs of a spider poking behind a wall clock That's The second picture of the clock spider after removing the clock from the wall And the last and scariest of all, look at its size! You can see his fur OMG! Not sure why I even wrote about this issue, it's too creepy to look at, but if you're into this kind of thing, show your love with a share. Here is a video of a similar spider creeping for hours. Granted, it's not the same, but it's scary enough to be included: The legend of this spider hidden behind the clock is spreading rapidly across the internet like wildfire, and as you can see from the Google Trend chart below, people really like to see photos and search about it: or clockspider [kangaroo] [spahy-der] Clock spider is a meme giant spider photographed hiding behind a wall clock. simp WAP Karen cancel the culture clock Spider Clock spider meme comes from a series of three photos depicting a spider, first posted in April 2003 kenratboy on Klipsch.com messageboards, in a thread called Look at this wolf spider!!! In the pictures there is a huge hunting spider crawling from behind the clock. The clock spider spreads like a meme online, with the name of the clock spider appearing on internet newsgroups later this month. The clock spider was variously defined at the Urban Dictionary by the summer of 2016, with many entries humorously depicting the clock spider as a sort of dreaded, almighty ruler. The spider meme clock continued to circulate for several years after its debut, and the fascination-and fear of its massive size continued into 2010. Another appeal of the hour-long spider is that it raises the question of where else these large spiders might be hiding. The clock spider is sometimes joked to be a term that one should never Google. The only thing I'm worried about right now is the spider clock @contlapposto Twitter (April 20, 2017) Just taking selfies with resident spider library ichthyologist Tumblr (August 22, 2016) AIEE!!! Spider clock! KILL HIM WITH FIRE!!! Joey deVilla, Just another day in Australia, Adventures of the Accordion Guy in the Twenty-First Century (September 17, 2012) simp WAP Karen abolish the culture clock spider meme inspired other internet users to share similar images, videos, and memes of large spiders lurking in unlikely everyday places, including clocks, with the term clock spider being used to refer to any particularly huge spider, as if the spider clock itself was a species of spider. Smaller spiders found and/or photographed for hours will also be called clock spiders. This is not meant to be a formal definition of spider clock, as most concepts we define on Dictionary.com, but is a rather informal word summary that hopefully touches on key aspects of the meaning and use of spider clocks to help our users expand their word mastery. One of the most common concerns that people have are spiders. Your particular opinion, creepy crawlies manage to send a little trembling down the spine of even the bravest souls. What if there was a spider that actually lived up to the hype of arachnophobia (fear of spiders)? The hunting spider is really a miracle of nature, but before we get to different aspects of the spider itself, let's take a quick look (rather a fun look) at the urban legend that surrounds it. Clock spider urban legends Most of us might believe that urban legends are all scary or chilling, but this urban legend was actually born through meme culture (yes, you read that right). They say a giant hunting spider was found by someone in their relative's house. The place where they found the spider was under the wall clock (hence the infamous nickname spider of the clock). The person ended up shooting the spider, as mentioned above. The legend - or perhaps rather a joke - is that the spider had a ninth leg. The reason he lost it is because he had a battle with limecat (I also expected something more interesting). The legend goes on to describe how this spider became a god and some other nonsense about how to worship it (pure joke, I hope). Now, silly enough modern mumbo-jumbo, let's jump into the scientific aspects of this fascinating spider. The physical appearance of the hunting spider is from the Sparassidae family. Sparassidae family of spiders all have eight eyes, facing forward in two rows of four. This particular species of spider can grow to incredibly large sizes. In Laos, a male hunter spider can reach a leg span of 25 to 30 cm. These spiders are often confused with tarantulas, but the characteristic factor is that their legs are angular and extend forward, like a crab. (Photo Credit : JonRichfield/Wikimedia Commons) The upper surface of the hunter spider boasts inconspicuous shades of gray and brown, while the lower surface of the spider is apomatically colored black and white. The word apometrically means that the color display is a sign of warning to potential predators. These spiders tend to dwell under rocks, tree bark and similar natural structures. As for where they can interfere with human habitation, the spider clock can be found in shared shelters, garages and distributed spaces (less often). Their vision is very good, allowing them to detect approaching people and other large animals from a certain distance, which is why they may not be seeing everything so often! Interestingly, before the rise of the hunter to being a (un)famous mural spider, the spider hunter appeared in another sensational pop-culture form – Spiderman! Yes, the spider that bites Peter Parker and turns him into his superhero form is none other than a social hunter spider. The production of poison Like most spiders, the sparassidae family of spiders uses poison to immobilize their prey. Poison is used not only for hunting, but also fits as a defensive tactic. (Photo Credit : Wikimedia Commons) Huntsman spiders are some of the few spiders that can bite humans and be harmful. Most spiders can not pierce human skin, and even if they succeed, their poison is not strong enough for something larger than a small beetle or worm. That being said, not all spider hunters that bite have bites that are dangerous to humans, although many bites are painful and cause inflammation due to the large size of fangs. There is one neurologically powerful spider hunter out there- Neosparassus in Australia Neosparassus or Badge Huntsman spiders are a group of spiders found in Australia. They begin their life green and become brown in subsequent molts. These spiders are the main culprits of dangerous spider bites, and their bites can cause nausea, headaches and vomiting, although these symptoms occur very rarely. Mating Rituals Male Heteropoda venatoria is a hunter spider species that can be found all over the world. It was recently found to intentionally make a substrate-borne sound when it detects a chemical (pheromone) left behind by females of the same species. The men then try to find a trace of the pheromones left by the women. Once found, they are lowered to the ground and firmly anchored, after which they use their feet to transmit vibrations from the body to the surface with which they are in contact. (Photo Credit : Wikimedia Commons) Most of the sound emitted is produced by strong vibrations from the abdomen. Each male emits vibrations with a characteristic frequency, which helps women distinguish between different males who compete for their attention. The usual pattern of these vibrations consists of short bursts of intense vibrations. If the female is interested in mating, she will follow the vibrations to the source, where the male will wait to colate with her. For humans, these sounds can often be heard as rhythmic ticking, like a quartz clock that disappears in and out. However, such mating calls can be heard only in a relatively quiet environment. So the next time you hear the legend of the spider clock, maybe you can shed a little true light rather than perpetuate the myth! Reference: Reference:
