Harsh signs put pupils from languages (A) Harsh and inconsistent markings puts pupils in England from learning languages over the age of 14, a report says. The launch of stricter GCSEs will further reduce interest in languages, research by the British Council and the Education Development Fund suggests. It states that focusing on mathematics and science, as well as the perception of languages are difficult options, as well as de-motivating students and teachers. (B) Exams watchdog Ofqual said last year's language results were very stable. From September 2016, new modern LANGUAGE GCSE and A-level language programmes will be taught in England, and new exams will be taken in the summer of 2018. The study of language trends, in the 14th year of charting the state of language learning in schools in England, suggests that these changes, especially at A-level, will deter pupils from learning languages. It says: The exam system is seen as one of the main obstacles to the successful development of language teaching. The comparative difficulty of language exams compared to other subjects, as well as the widespread rigid and inconsistent labelling, are deeply de-motivating both students and teachers. C) The report states that EBacc, where pupils must learn English, language, maths, science and history or geography at GCSE, seems to have very little impact on the number of pupils taking languages after 16. The uptake after GCSE is found to be of particular concern, with some public schools suggesting a small number of students prefer to take languages at the level means that the subject is becoming financially irrefutable. (D) The share of the general cohort sitting gcse on the tongue decreased by one percentage point (to 48%) Between 2014 and 2015, ending the growth records seen since 2012, when EBacc was attracted by inch entries for each of the three major languages fell this year compared to 2014, French fell by 6%, German fell by 10% and Spanish fell by 3%. Overall entries for A-levels are at 94% of 2002 levels, and they fell by 3% between 2014 and 2015 - French takeovers fell by 1% and German by 2.5%, while Spanish takeovers rose by almost 15%. (e) The report noted some positive developments, particularly at the primary level, which stated that just over half of primary schools in England now have access to special knowledge in language teaching. However, primary schools report that it is difficult for them to incorporate languages into existing curricula and to recruit well-qualified teaching staff. Teresa Tinsley, co-author of the report, said: Languages are already one of the toughest GCSEs and teachers fear there will be more pupils with the new exams get a good grade. Combine this with the expectation that a wider range of students will take the exam, and it is not surprising that teachers feel combative. Improving their morale and the exam system is critical to the prosperity of languages in our schools. (F) a spokesman for the exam regulator, Ofqual, said: We are committed to ensuring that all GCSEs, AS and A-levels, including in modern foreign languages, are sufficiently valid, produce fair and reliable results and have a positive impact on learning and learning. Last year's results in modern foreign languages were very stable, with only small changes in the proportions of achievement of each class compared to the previous year. We looked at concerns that students find it harder to get the highest grades in A-level languages. We are keeping this under control and will be publishing further information soon. (G) Referring to the new modern foreign language A-levels and GCSEs taught from September this year, the spokesperson added: Before we accredit qualifications, we check exams will be designed to provide good differentiation - including that the best students will be able to achieve high grades - and whether they are properly based on the new subject content. (H) Mark Herbert, head of school programs at the British Council, said: The current shortage of language skills in the country is estimated to cost the economy tens of billions of lost trade and business opportunities each year. Parents, schools and businesses can play a role in encouraging our youth to learn languages in school and in ensuring that language learning brings back the respect and prominence they deserve. Tony McAleavy, director of research and development at the Education Development Fund, said: The decline in pupils choosing GCSE and A-level languages concerns, especially when combined with teachers' lack of faith in the exam system. Solutions are needed to give languages a stronger place in the curriculum, to make languages more compelling for students who see the exam process as a barrier, and to boost teachers morale. Read the excerpt below and then answer the questions. The war on smoking makes no mistake, the move to introduce simple packaging is just the latest front in the war against smoking. Over the past decade, a ban on smoking in public places and measures to restrict displays in stores have been introduced. But one of the issues that has been regarding health experts and ministers is the number of people who continue to take smoking, especially young people. More than 200,000 under-16s start in the UK each year - helping to ensure a viable market remains for growers once the number of people quit smoking and die is taken into account. In countries such as the UK, where there is a ban on advertising, the package remains the last major vehicle for promotion. Hence the details and caution taken in the design packages with their laminated and special effects of printing, foil decorations and slide holes and beveled edges. So it's no surprise that they have become known as the silent seller and mobile billboard in the industry. They're so important. (Passage from here) Issues 1-4 Will fill the sentences.
