Two-thirds of African American students from low-income families cannot afford a down payment on a home, compared to more than a quarter of white students from the same family income level, according to a new report by the National Association of Realtors. About 1 in 4 black student borrowers end up defaulting on their loans, compared to about one-tenth of white student borrowers. There is a stark racial disparity on the road to homeownership: 30 percent of black first-time buyers from low-income families are black. The difference is even more dramatic among renters. A 2013 NAR report showed that 70 percent of renters living in areas with a large black population are black, compared to just 31 percent of black renters in suburban areas. There are myriad factors that keep people from owning a home, such as lack of credit or not enough savings for a down payment, but some of it is rooted in race. On July 19, NAR, a group that represents real estate agents, released a new report on the issues facing African Americans when buying a home. The report said that not only are black renters more likely to be black, but “disproportionately low incomes and smaller down payments are hampering their access to homeownership.”

The lack of access to home ownership and the lack of wealth among black Americans is a major source of the wealth gap between black and white Americans, according to a recent report from the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis. The median net worth of a black household, according to the Fed, was just $5,000, while the median net worth of white households was $142,400. “If the wealth gap is a crisis for the economy, what is the crisis for African American families and communities?” Timmons said. “We need to invest in ways that will enable young African Americans to take the necessary steps toward homeownership,” she added. “This is the only way we can break the cycle of poverty and assist our communities in becoming self-sufficient.” A 2017 Brookings Institute study looked at what economic trends 520fdb1ae7
