The concepts of autoimmunity and tolerance are now defined and it is important to understand that tolerance must be initiated by the antigen-presenting cell, the effector T cell, and the suppressive cell. Our understanding of the interactions between the components of the antigen-presenting cell, the T cell and the suppressive cell is necessary to explain how the presence of an antigen initiates an immune response. The control of immune responses and tolerance must involve not only the T cell receptor and antigen-presenting cell but also many other cells, including B cells, mast cells, eosinophils, macrophages and myeloid dendritic cells. This review discusses the rationale for immunosuppression, with an emphasis on identifying and avoiding common factors that may contribute to organ damage in the treatment of several autoimmune diseases. Finally, potential strategies that may be used to avoid or delay the development of organ-specific autoimmune diseases in man will be proposed.Q: How to remove the last occurrence of a string from a vector?
