We have to use /link in Windows 8 and Windows 8.1 to load the Universal Windows Platform Runtime (UWP) libraries. If you are using Windows 8.1, then you have to copy the libraries to %AppData%\Microsoft\Windows\UCRT\ to use the .NET Core UWP libraries. However, for Windows 8, you can copy the libraries to %ProgramFiles%\Windows Kits\10\bin\Win10\ and it should work. In the same step, you have to add the dependency: Once you run the app, you can see the output screen with Hello

World! in the emulator. You can now use the Universal Windows Platform (UWP) APIs in .NET Core. Summary This post introduced you to the Universal Windows Platform and showed you how to use it in .NET Core. The next part will explore using the Universal Windows Platform (UWP) APIs in .NET Core. Here is a brief recap of the meeting: Teams: 1. SAP (Paul Place) 2.

Enron Field (Duncan McNaughton) 3. Mars Industries (Dave Cichon) Team 1: As promised, Paul Place in RCR (SAP implementation group) has approached his customers and is preparing a new document showing how they currently work. Paul has a favorable response from each customer. This document will be used to set the requirements for future development. Team 2: Mike Duncan, the technical architect in the SF office, is coordinating with key players in the development of a prototype that is in the IT environment. This prototype has been tested with customers and has the ability to simulate a number of scenarios.

Mike believes this prototype will be ready for execution in the near future. We have contracted with a software development group, who have a number of software development people and have had extensive experience with this type of software implementation. The main players are Gary Hold onto this opportunity as we are prepared to announce the development team in the very near future. Team 3: Dave Cichon, the materials specialist, is working with 520fdb1ae7
