Hello everyone, and welcome to another episode of What is the difference between the current Economy and the previous one? where I try to break down the technical aspects of the current markets and where we can go from here. The last episode was all about the effects of the previous market crash on the current one, which to some extent can be linked to the previous one too. So, we can say that the current markets have been affected by previous issues that, to some extent, will be reflected in the next several years. We can have a look at the current economic situation and know the differences between the current one and the previous one. In today's episode, I will be highlighting the differences between the current economy and the previous one. Looking into the current economy, we can see that the financial crisis of 2008-09 was an unprecedented problem that affected a lot of countries around the world. The problem started in the U.S., followed by the European Union, then China, Japan, and finally India, and it has stayed with us for a very long time. The other problem was the real estate bubble that peaked in 2007, when the value of real estate reached an all-time high. An example of the problem in the real estate market is Australia where the current value of real estate is $40,813 for a double-story home in Melbourne, which is almost double the value of $22,826 of the same home in 2017. Another problem that can be seen is the unemployment problem, especially in the U.S., where the total number of jobs is not keeping up with the country's population growth. The rate of unemployment is almost 10 percent, but there are still some who are not able to find jobs even after a lot of resumes have been submitted. Therefore, what is the difference between the current economy and the previous one? What is the difference between 520fdb1ae7
