Make a 360-degree look at the rotunda in Google Maps.) You'll want to spend most of your time at the third busiest station in the country, looking up: five floors of tall windows and glamorous Art Deco chandeliers illuminate the interior. Be sure to time before the train sits down and people 2015, which, according to Kerbol, is two football pitches. Oh, look, another Union station! Built in 1914, it was renovated and restored in 2014 and includes a hotel, three bars, an am Eatery amputee breakfast area throughout the day and Ultra, one of denver's favorite restaurants. The interior is relatively basic compared to other stations on this list, but the large exterior of this fine arts station makes our jaws drop every time. (Note that the hotel offers daily station tours for $20, if you're interested.) Bless the historians and conservators who had the main hall of this station return to its original form in 2010, after previous attempts to modernize the building by covering its beautiful ceiling with flowing on-the-mill acoustic tiles. Look down when entering the building to check for intricate mosaic floor tiles; it is clear why this entry is called the Compass Room. You won't be able to see in the building's clock tower for yourself - once it made the station seattle's tallest building, but local channel K5 did a video tour last year. If this station looks very different from the others, it is because it is a pioneer in the architectural style called Mission Modern. Influenced by a combination of classics in California such as The Spanish Colonial and Mission Renaissance, as well as Art Deco scrap - the building has spectacular wood-base ceilings, 1930s-style chandeliers and narrow-leaf 110-foot ticket counters. Even if you weren't at the station, chances are you've seen it on screen: it appears in movies like Blade Runner, Catch Me If You Can, and City, Caesar! If you want to see the place for yourself, go to the station on the second Sunday of the month, when you can catch a free tour of the art and architecture of space - find more information here. Opened in 1915, Santa Fe Depot is defined by the Spanish style-building reminiscent of 17th-century missions, as well as the rows of palm trees that line their tracks. The starting point for Amtrak's coastal journey in the Pacific Surfliner, ending in San Luis Obispo, the station has an impressive vaulted ceiling in its cave waiting room. Less than 40 years ago, worcester's union in central Massachusetts was in a complete disaster, and Amtrak actually used a separate station to service the area. But after restoration in the late 1990s, the station was as good as new, with 175-foot towers restoring stained glass stained glass and marble floors returning to its former glory. Commuters passing through Richmond will recognize the brick of the station's six-story clock tower, which runs between states 95. Inside, a fully restored station mimics the design of the original Victorian-era building - with a colourful, green and white paint scheme, according to Amtrak's historic Website of the Great American it takes a lot to look so good at 123 123 Old. There have been numerous renovations starting in 1927, when Italian marble was added to the walls and floors, and later in 1987, with the restoration of the detailed floral ceiling of the waiting room. What about the clock at the station? He still has to get injured every seven days, according to the Portland Monthly. Monthly.
