I know that you can use a shell builtin like basename or dirname for a single file but this question is slightly different. I want to extract the directory part of a path without any other contents. So if the directory path is 'foo/bar' then the command should return 'foo'. A: You could use sed to do it. The following would extract all directories from a given path: $ echo $PATH | sed -n's#.*##p' /home/sousachman/bin /usr/local/bin /bin /sbin -n suppresses output Try: ls -d */ This will find the directory part of the path, ignoring any empty directory names Or find /the/dirt/you/are/looking/for -maxdepth 1 -type d -name */ This research program is designed to elucidate the interactions of lithium ions with the cation-binding sites of several enzymes involved in energy metabolism. The enzymes to be studied are a potassium-activated adenosine triphosphatase, an enzyme closely associated with the glycolytic system (phosphofructokinase), and the pyruvate dehydrogenase complex, which is a regulatory site of carbohydrate metabolism. The effects of lithium ions on the kinetics of these enzymes will be determined by measuring the initial rate of reactions catalyzed by the enzyme. The binding of lithium ions to the active site and to the protein exterior will be studied by direct assay and by competition studies.Overexpression of the five-o'clock (FTO) gene is not a risk factor for sleep apnea-hypopnea syndrome (SAHS) in the Brazilian population. 520fdb1ae7
