New teachers often have stiff competition when it comes to affordable teaching positions. To stand out to potential employers or school boards, a new teacher must format his resume so that he shows his qualifications and skills in the teaching industry despite little experience. The resume should present the identity and qualifications of the new teacher on the first page, so the employer does not have to spend time searching for the appropriate skills. Because teachers will work with children or young adults, employers or school boards will often look for a teacher who has a lot of patience. The new teacher's summary should provide a short list, summing up the basic qualities that determine the teacher's personality and employment skills. This can include enthusiasm, energetic, patient and creative and with a focus on the student's ability to learn. The list of qualifications, also known as a qualification summary, is a list of points or information that entitles the teacher to the position. Skills may include previous experiences with children, communication skills, planning opportunities, genuine interest in working with children and annual voluntary classroom experience. The list should apply to the training post in question, so if the post was working with children with disabilities, the list should reflect experience in that particular area. The new teacher's resume includes educational achievements, as new teachers often have little practical experience to show on resumes. Educational information should include the name of the institutions where the teacher completed the necessary education, and the emphasis on the degree program. For example, a teacher may have completed a four-year degree program as well as additional education to focus on teaching. Both degree programs are presented on resumes with graduation years and relevant agency locations. Any additional experience applicable to a teaching position should be included in the CV. Previous awards, recognition in the classroom, recognition in kindergartens or classrooms for voluntary work, and experience as a camp counselor during the summer should also be included. Since the teacher is new to the industry, she should use as much information as possible to create her presentation experience.
