I think Og rolled into the dough after he wrote this book in the 1970s. As a salesman and article writer, he had to know how people buy into what he said without secularizing beliefs. Thus, readers are not proselytizing (as in most Christian memoirs). If I suppose correctly, the seventies were a time when most people were stuck between fantastic and logic. As a salesman and article writer, he had to know how people buy into what he said without secularizing beliefs. Thus, readers are not proselytizing (as in most Christian memoirs). If I suppose correctly, the seventies were a time when most people were stuck between fantastic and logic. Og forms a true story (where is the evidence?) into a tale with various philosophical references and manages to bind it into a religious message. All this time he supports the facts, discussing evolution. The Liberals at the time must have been field day. I always find such books strange. Why should there be a supernatural explanation? This makes it more interesting, but much less believable. It's like the author is trying to sell the idea. Truth is often much stranger than fiction. If someone provides me with tangible proof of what is happening in this story, I would prefer not to buy into them. The writing is a bit disjointed. I can't decipher the specific philosophical points given throughout the story, which is important if you want to make a real impression on the reader. As it goes, everything seems to mash together in some kind of mumbo-jumbo. It's like getting a delicious, microwaved, mashed potato from Wegmans and then biting into lumps. It's disgusting. There are great moments made in this story, but it seems just every philosophy anyone has ever come across is smushed together to draw some handwritten conclusion. People think we don't control anything, and I think that's the right thing to do. As for Shakespeare's aphorism, the fault in ourselves is not that we cannot control things, but that we do nothing with them. Saying that Shakespeare did not believe in destiny is the most uneducated statement you can make. Everything in their environment affects their free will, but if we are our environment, then we have an indirect choice. That's my own philosophy. The actual format of Mandino's letter is unconvincing as well. There are multi-thousand places where commas should be inserted and are not. Being deep does not free you from grammar. It just makes me take you less seriously. Og's character, Simon shows that the human race because we have low self-esteem. I think that's for sure. Is, out of people who seem to be the most bloated ego in the universe. But if you look at most, society is stamped on our self-esteem until we are unsure of our goals - and even worse - ourselves. We relied on technical aspects and material goods to determine how much we are raised. That's when we got acquainted with the Memorandum of God. The problem with this memorandum is that it does not move or present a real solution. Using second person tactics is useless if you try to get one past me. The prose isn't even good. The solution that the Memorandum of God is trying to find is to find a common denominator among all people so that you make sense. How is it possible when you try to express that we are all human beings? How will this help a person's self-esteem? Of course, it makes me feel very good to know that I had the fastest sperm. I remind my friends when they're not sure of something. But you're the fastest sperm! That must be why you can't run. You never got over this workout. These are all great things. It's amazing to think about the cells inside each body and all the statistics showing how none of us should be alive. But to turn it into a counter-argument: well, there's a reason. Well, what is it? The second person can't tell someone that. Just because your self-esteem is enough doesn't mean you can solve the problems that come to you every day. It's not going to help you be alone. Saying that the longer you are unhappy, the better reward you will get, without explanation is the stupidest thing you can ever tell someone. Then what do I think can raise a person's self-esteem? Do what you love. Be yourself. Laugh. Keep busy. Open to other people with common interests. Take the time to get better than yourself. This will make you feel like a true person - a person should not isolate himself from 4 billion other sperm. It really makes you feel special though, doesn't it? Is it the greatest miracle, or the fastest sperm? ... More Before You Go...
