

Dear Possibility Manager,

There is an Edge that exists between having so much to do, and there being actually nothing to do. You have so many friends, but who actually really knows you? So many things are so important, but who holds the values that make them important?

It is an Edge of reality, a place between Bullshit and Nothing, a place where you can sit and dangle your feet over sensing the void below you. How often do you hang out there? What actually drives you away from that special and precious Edge?

Why is it that whenever the Edge resolves itself in front of you – suddenly appearing out of the fog – you quickly dodge it, using anything and everything to move back away from the Edge? Why is nothing scarier than this Edge?

And what are the ways you distract yourself from the Edge? How do you muffle the sense of crispness and brilliance that can occur at the Edge? How do you convince yourself that the Edge does not exist? How do you distract yourself into thinking the Edge is so far away that it cannot possibly matter to you, when actually it is present in your very next breath?

The reason we ask these questions is that when a new Possibility arrives, or an old Possibility vanishes, this can generate a bright enough illumination that the Edge becomes visible. That Edge is a Flux Point where you get to choose to continue doing the same old thing, or choose to try something completely different from what is happening right now.

If the Edge is too scary for you to experience, suppressing your fear does not make the Edge go away. But it could make the Possibility go away.

To test your Edginess Affinity Factor, we offer you a number of simple opportunities below. The test works by experimentally Notice what comes up in you as you read each invitation.

Can you sense the Edge in each offer? Can you Self Observe your visceral or emotive or intellectual reaction to the Edge? Is your reaction to move towards that Edge, or to retreat away from that Edge? Neither response, of course, is right or wrong, good or bad. However, noticing your Edginess Affinity responses can be very useful for managing Possibility!

We wish you happy Edgeworking!

An Edgeworker named Margaret Sap from Amsterdam searched the internet for teams creating possibility for the evolution of human consciousness. She found Possibility Management. Margaret recently recorded short interviews with several Possibilitators including Eva Daubert, Anne-Chloé Destremau, and Clinton Callahan to include in the 24 video windows of her 2022 Your December To Remember Advent Calendar. Hint: One of the windows is a meeting with Neal Donald Walsh! To get your free access to these 24 daily inspirations starting 1 December 2022, register at: https://yourdecembertoremember.com
