Jay Asher is a bestselling author of young adult novels. His debut novel, Thirteen Reasons Why, has sold over 3 million copies in the US and was adapted into a Netflix series. He also wrote The Future of Us with Carolyn Mackler and What Light. Piper is his graphic novel debut. Thirteen Reasons Why was initially rejected twelve times before its thirteenth attempt led to its publication. The novel's author drew inspiration from a family member who attempted suicide due to seeing it as an escape from pain, leading him to delve deeper into the story's main character, Hannah Baker. To capture her emotions accurately, he gathered information from women about their high school experiences. Asher deliberately chose not to focus on mental health issues in his story, instead highlighting how people are treated. Thirteen Reasons Why remained in hardcover longer than usual due to its enduring popularity and sales fueled by author participation. The novel follows Hannah Baker, a 17-year-old high school sophomore who takes her own life after being sexually abused and harassed, leaving behind seven double-sided cassette tapes detailing the thirteen reasons that led to her suicide. Clay Jensen is the narrator of the story, who finds himself on one of the tapes, with Hannah clarifying that he does not deserve blame for her death. The novel explores themes through the perspectives of various characters, including Justin Foley and Alex Standall, each playing significant roles in shaping Hannah's fate. Hannah's friendship with several classmates ends abruptly due to rumors and betrayal. Jessica Davis, a friend of Hannah's before Alex's "hot or not" list, is blamed by Hannah for spreading rumors about her. Tyler Down, a classmate who worked as a photographer for the yearbook, stalked Hannah through her bedroom window, causing concern. Courtney Crimsen, an acquaintance who helped catch Tyler, further damaged Hannah's reputation by spreading false rumors about finding sexual "toys" in her bedroom. Marcus Cooley, who once went on a date with Hannah, tried to take advantage of her and called her hurtful names when she rejected him. Zach Dempsey, who attempted to comfort Hannah after a confrontation with Marcus, turned on her when she rejected him. Ryan Shaver, a former classmate who stole one of Hannah's poems from the school newspaper, humiliated her by publishing it anonymously. Jenny Kurtz, a cheerleader who offered to drive Hannah home from her first party, blamed her for causing a car accident that later killed another classmate. Bryce Walker, who raped an unconscious Jessica at his party, later assaulted Hannah at another gathering, leaving her helpless and despairing. Mr. Porter, the school counsellor, was unable to provide sufficient support, instead suggesting Hannah confront Bryce or "let it go" and move on. Tony, a student who received copies of tapes about Hannah's abuse, tried to warn her parents but was left alone to watch over those named as reasons for her death. Clay Jensen receives a mysterious package with seven cassette tapes recorded by Hannah Baker, a classmate who died from suicide. The tapes are meant for Clay and several other classmates, each containing instructions to visit someone and pass them on to the next person. As Clay listens to the tapes, he learns that Hannah attributes her reasons for her death to each of the people mentioned. After sending the tapes to Skye Miller, a classmate he suspects may be suicidal, the novel ends with Clay reaching out to her. The book has received mixed reviews, but it became a bestseller after its release and was adapted into a Netflix show. However, some critics have raised concerns about the book's depiction of mental illness and suicide, as well as its portrayal of sexual assault. Some argue that the book should be given a warning label to alert readers of the content. Others believe that the book is an important resource for young adults, teaching them how life events can lead to negative thoughts and feelings. In 2017, a Mesa County School District curriculum director banned a book due to student suicides. After deliberation, librarians reinstated the book, concluding it wasn't as graphic as its TV counterpart. Parent notices were sent out. By 2024, the book was banned in schools across Florida, Michigan, North Carolina, South Carolina, Utah, Texas, North Dakota, and Pennsylvania. Despite controversy, Festus High School supports the novel, recognizing that discussing difficult topics can lead to meaningful conversations. Educators argue that incorporating the book into curricula can improve reading comprehension, analytic skills, and students' ability to apply its themes in their own lives. The author encourages high schools to adopt the novel as a conversation starter for anti-bullying efforts. Additionally, the book is seen as a supplement for local initiatives discussing suicide with parents and children. After two seasons, the series has four seasons that extend the original plot from the novel. In the book, Clay listens to Hannah's tapes in one night; in the TV series, he takes several days to listen to them. The book reveals that Hannah dies by suicide, but the TV series depicts a different method of suicide. Two years after the show's release, this graphic scene was cut out. The parents' business is also changed from a shoe store in the book to a drugstore in the TV series. The book features Clay and Hannah as primary narrators, while the series presents details about each character through multiple perspectives. The lawsuit against the school in the book is not present in the series. The names of people mentioned on the tapes are also changed: Jenny Kurtz becomes Sheri Holland. Thirteen Reasons Why is a teen drama series on Netflix developed by Brian Yorkey and based on Jay Asher's novel Thirteen Reasons Why. The show revolves around Clay Jensen, played by Dylan Minnette, after his friend Hannah Baker, Katherine Langford, dies by suicide, leaving behind cassette tapes detailing the reasons for her death. In July 2019, Netflix censored the suicide scene in the first-season finale. The show was initially successful enough for Netflix to renew it for a second season in May 2017, which premiered on May 18, 2018, and received mostly negative reviews from critics. To coincide with the release of the second season, Netflix released a video featuring the cast warning viewers about some of the topics covered in the show and providing resources for those affected by mental health issues. A third season was ordered in June 2018 and released on August 23, 2019, followed by a fourth and final season that premiered on June 5, 2020. The series takes place in Evergreen, California, and follows Liberty High student Clay Jensen as he receives a set of cassette tapes recorded by Hannah Baker, a former student who took her own life. Each tape reveals the reasons why various people in Hannah's life are connected to her death. In the second season, Hannah's parents sue the school district after her tapes are released online, leading to further consequences for Liberty High's students. The third season takes place eight months after the events of the second and focuses on Ani Achola, a new student at Liberty High, as she narrates the story of Clay and his friends trying to keep Tyler's attempted school shooting a secret. Tensions rise among the tapes' subjects after Bryce is killed, with Clay becoming a suspect. In the final season, Clay's mental health deteriorates due to the deaths of Bryce and Monty, while the other students prepare for their graduation and future plans. The show features a strong cast, including Dylan Minnette as Clay Jensen, who becomes obsessed with uncovering what drove Hannah to take her life. At the end-of-year dance, Clay Jensen gets unexpected help from Ryan Shaver. Ryan also becomes the primary suspect in the murder investigation of Bryce Walker in the third season. The fourth season focuses on Ryan's struggles with mental health and subsequent recovery. Hannah Baker arrives at Liberty High as a new student in seasons 1-2, leaving behind tapes detailing thirteen reasons why she took her life. Tony Padilla tries to help Clay deal with Hannah's death, taking responsibility for making sure everyone hears the audio cassettes she gave him. However, his family is deported by I.C.E. after Bryce Walker reports them. Jessica Davis joins Liberty High around the same time as Hannah and starts a sexual assault survivors club on campus due to her own experience of being raped by Bryce before the events. She later becomes student body president in the third season and has an on-again, off-again relationship with Justin Foley throughout the series. Justin Foley is initially popular at Liberty High but comes from an abusive family background. He gets into a relationship with Jessica and helps start a movement after discovering that Bryce sexually assaulted her. At the end of the second season, Justin becomes Clay's foster brother when he is adopted by Clay's parents. Bryce Walker is revealed to be a serial rapist who assaults several girls including Jessica and Hannah. His friendship with Zach Dempsey ends when Bryce breaks Zach's knee at the homecoming game. He is eventually killed by Alex Standall in the third season after being severely injured by Zach. Alex Standall initially forms close friendships with Jessica and Hannah, but his relationship with Jessica changes when they start dating. In the fourth season, he dates Winston Williams and Charlie St. George. Zach's actions lead to him losing his college scholarships after he assaults Bryce at the river pier, causing serious injuries. Meanwhile, Tyler Down struggles as a shy and bullied student who takes photos of his classmates, including Hannah. His life takes a dark turn when he is sexually assaulted by Monty, leading him to contemplate a school shooting that gets foiled by Clay. The aftermath of this incident forms the emotional core of the third and fourth seasons. Clay's mother, Lainie Jensen, works tirelessly as an attorney representing Liberty High in Hannah's trial. However, her dedication takes a toll on her personal life, ultimately leading to a divorce from Andy Baker. Olivia Baker's quest for truth leads her to uncover dark secrets about Hannah's death. After the trial, she leaves Liberty and starts anew in New York. The story of Ani Achola unfolds as a new student at Liberty High who becomes entangled in Bryce's web. Her close friendship with Jessica creates tension when Clay discovers that she slept with Bryce. Nora Walker takes on a more assertive role in her son Bryce's life, particularly after his transfer to prevent him from repeating past mistakes. Monty de la Cruz emerges as a complex figure - a fierce bully who conceals his true nature and struggles within himself. His friendship with Bryce hides the turmoil brewing inside him. A violent encounter with Winston Williams follows after he shares an intimate moment with Monty, leading to further complications in their relationship. Mark Pellegrino plays Bill Standall, Alex's father and a deputy sheriff. Tyler Barnhardt is Charlie St. George, a student who becomes close friends with Monty but also develops feelings for Alex when he spends time with Clay's group. Deaken Bluman portrays Winston Williams, a former Hillcrest student who dates Monty and helps investigate Bryce's murder after transferring to Liberty High. Jan Luis Castellanos plays Diego Torres, the leader of a divided football team struggling to cope with the loss of one of their own. Gary Sinise is Dr. Robert Ellman, an adolescent therapist working with Clay to overcome anxiety, depression, and grief. Josh Hamilton appears as Matt Jensen, a college professor and Clay's father. Michele Selene Ang plays Courtney Crimsen, a closeted student who spreads rumors about Hannah to protect her own secret. Steven Silver portrays Marcus Cole, the self-centered student body president responsible for humiliating and harassing Hannah. Ajiona Alexus is Sheri Holland, a cheerleader who forms a bond with Clay but is involved in actions that result in Jeff's death. Tommy Dorfman plays Ryan Shaver, a student who betrays Hannah's trust, and Sosie Bacon portrays Skye Miller, an estranged friend of Clay. In the context of Hannah's bipolar disorder diagnosis, the following characters were part of the show. Jeff Atkins, played by Brandon Larracuente, was a kind-hearted student at Liberty High who was close to Clay and died in a tragic car accident. The principal, Gary Bolan, was portrayed by Steven Weber, while Pam Bradley, the Communications teacher, was acted out by Keiko Agena. Additionally, there were several other characters that appeared throughout the series, including Greg Davis, played by Joseph C. Phillips, who was Jessica's father and a colonel in the United States Air Force; Noelle Davis, portrayed by Andrea Roth, who was Jessica's mother; Karen Dempsey, played by Cindy Cheung, who was Zach's widowed mother; May Dempsey, acted out by Anna Zavelson, who was Zach's friendly younger sister; Peter Standall, played by Alex MacNicoll, who was Alex's older brother and appeared in seasons 1-3 with recurring appearances in season 4; Brad, played by Henry Zaga, who was Tony's boyfriend that broke up sometime between the first and second seasons. Filming for the third season started in August 2018 but was halted due to a wildfire until December. The fourth and final season began filming in July 2019 and concluded in December. The show premiered its first season on Netflix in March 2017, which received positive reviews for its subject matter and acting, with Langford earning a Golden Globe Award nomination. However, the show's graphic depiction of mature themes like suicide and rape prompted concerns from mental health professionals, leading to the addition of warning cards and videos. In response to criticism, Netflix edited out the suicide scene in the first season's final episode in July 2019. The series received divided reactions, with some praising its portrayal of teenage grief while others criticized its handling of mature themes. The show was renewed for multiple seasons, with a third released on August 23, 2019, and a fourth on June 5, 2020. The series received a score of 76 out of 100 from 17 critics, indicating generally favorable reviews. IGN praised it highly, calling it "very powerful" and ranking it among the best high school dramas of the 21st century. The Boston Globe gave a glowing review, stating that the drama is "sensitive", "engaging", and "unblinking". Variety called the series "sincere" and "creatively successful", making it essential viewing. Entertainment Weekly praised the series as an authentic portrayal of being young, lost, and fragile. The Hollywood Reporter also praised the series, citing its performances, direction, relevance, and maturity as strong points. Many reviewers praised the acting, particularly Katherine Langford's performance as Hannah, who "shines" in the lead role, and Dylan Minnette's portrayal of Clay, which was seen as a difficult but well-done task. The chemistry between Langford and Minnette was also frequently praised, with some calling it "pure pleasure". The supporting cast, including Kate Walsh, Alisha Boe, Miles Heizer, and Christian Navarro, received positive mentions for their performances. Reviews of the series highlighted its diverse cast and mature approach to complex subject matter, with critics praising its honesty and emotional depth. The show's directors were also commended for keeping performances grounded and avoiding exploitative moments. However, some reviewers criticized the portrayal of teen angst, calling it artificial and overly preachy. One critic found a plot device particularly unbelievable, while another expressed concern that the series' message might not resonate with older viewers, unlike similar shows set in high school. One-note and dreadful. A student implores, 'It has to get better,' but with an open ending, it appears unlikely. Washington Post critic Hank Stuever slammed the show as contrived, implausible: "13 episodes, 13 super-sullen hours – a passive-aggressive effort that's mainly about miscommunication, delivering no wisdom or insight on depression, bullying, and suicide." He criticized Hannah's suicide tapes, finding them naive in understanding suicide. David Wiegand of San Francisco Chronicle praised Langford's performance but noted character inconsistencies: "The script pushes the bounds of credibility... teenagers embody conflicting emotions, but the script here is unbelievable." Overall, the series worked despite gimmicky structure and inconsistent characters. The fourth season of the series received overwhelmingly negative reviews from critics, who panned the writing and story, as well as the ending. The critical consensus on Rotten Tomatoes states that the season "breaks away" from its earlier formula and becomes a "melodramatic mess". On Metacritic, the average score is 23 out of 100, based on four critics, indicating generally unfavourable reviews. The second season of 13 Reasons Why gained significant attention upon its release. According to Jumpshot, it was the second-most viewed Netflix season in its first 30 days, with 48% of viewers watching at least one episode. The series saw an 18% increase in week-over-week viewership from week one to two. Additionally, the premiere episode drew 6.08 million viewers in the U.S. within its first three days of release. The show's audience was primarily young (75%) and female (65%), with males making up 35% of viewers. The series received several award nominations, including a Golden Globe nomination for Katherine Langford and a win for Kent at the Guild of Music Supervisors Awards. It also won the NAACP Image Award for Outstanding Directing in a Drama Series. However, the show's depiction of sensitive content, such as teen suicide, self-harm, rape, and bullying, raised public concern about suicide contagion among teenagers. The graphic nature of certain scenes, including Hannah's suicide, sparked criticism from researchers and medical professionals who argued that the series violated guidelines for depicting suicide in the media and may trigger "imitative" behaviors. The show's impact on young people was a topic of concern for experts and the public alike. Some argued that it romanticized suicide and didn't provide sufficient resources to help viewers dealing with similar issues. The community expressed worry over targeting vulnerable teens and portraying mental health professionals in an unhelpful light. Efforts were made by mental health experts to educate the general public on how to handle situations like those depicted in the show. They also shared accurate information about teen suicide, depression, and traumatic events through research connected to the series and resources for young people seeking help. The show's release coincided with a significant increase in Google searches related to suicide in the US, including a 26% spike in searches for how to commit suicide. While there was an initial rise in crisis calls after the first episode, overall crisis call volume decreased throughout the series. However, some children's hospitals observed increases in self-harm admissions and youth mental health services like Headspace in Australia issued warnings due to the show's graphic content and increased call volumes. The series included a warning at each episode's end, read in different voices, including Katherine Langford's native Australian accent. In response to the show's graphic content and New Zealand's high youth suicide rate during 2009-2012, the country created an "RP18" rating, requiring those under 18 to watch with parental supervision. The National Association of School Psychologists in the US released a statement expressing concerns that exposure to another person's suicide could be a risk factor for vulnerable youth contemplating or attempting suicide. The United States Society of Clinical Child and Adolescent Psychology also noted how strongly the series might serve as a trigger for self-injury among vulnerable youth, lamenting the depiction of mental health professionals as ineffective. Some clinical psychologists have expressed concerns about the risk of suicide contagion, while others have defended the show's intention to dispel myths about suicides being quiet. However, a counselor at The Family Institute noted that one show alone was unlikely to trigger someone to attempt suicide. Mental health professionals criticized the series' depiction of suicide itself, much of which violates widely promulgated recommendations for reporting on actual suicides or not depicting them in fiction to avoid encouraging copycat suicides. The portrayal of Hannah's life and eventual suicide in the series has sparked controversy among mental health professionals. Some have argued that the show might inadvertently promote a romanticized view of suicide, while others worry that it could mislead viewers into thinking that seeking help is not necessary or effective. Critics like Alex Moen, a school counselor from Minneapolis, feel that the plotline perpetuates unrealistic expectations about what happens after someone takes their own life. They argue that the show's depiction of communication with loved ones and seeking justice through the boyfriend's actions is far-fetched and potentially damaging. Similarly, the Canadian Mental Health Association (CMHA) and the Centre for Suicide Prevention (CSP) have expressed concerns about the series' potential to glamorize suicide and cause distress in viewers, particularly younger ones. They point out that the portrayal of Hannah's death does not adhere to established guidelines for responsible media representation. The CMHA and CSP emphasize the importance of raising awareness about preventable health concerns like suicide in a safe and responsible manner. They highlight research showing clear links between increases in suicide rates and harmful media portrayals, citing potential risks such as simplifying the causes of suicide, making it seem romantic or logical, displaying graphic content, or misrepresenting help-seeking behaviors. These criticisms underscore the need for more accurate and nuanced portrayals of mental health issues and the impact of media on viewers. May not perpetuate the misconception that suicide is a means to teach others a lesson, but rather raises awareness about its prevalence and the need for support. A study conducted in 2019 found a significant increase in suicide rates among teenagers following the release of the show. Netflix responded by adding warnings before certain episodes and editing the depiction of a suicidal scene. The executive producer defended the series, stating that it aimed to portray a realistic and tragic story while acknowledging the backlash. 13 Reasons Why Soundtrack Series - Released from March 2017 to August 2019, Various Artists Albums: * The first soundtrack was released on March 30, 2017, with a total of 13 tracks. It also touches on the controversy surrounding Netflix's show "13 Reasons Why" and its potential impact on suicide rates. The article references several studies and experts who have weighed in on the topic, including a review by Christopher J. Ferguson that found no correlation between fictional media depicting suicide and actual suicide attempts. The Netflix series "13 Reasons Why" has been the subject of controversy and scientific study regarding its potential impact on viewers' mental health, particularly in regards to suicide rates. A study published in the Journal of the American Academy of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry found no association between the show's release and an increase in suicide rates among US teens. However, other research suggested that while the show may not have directly caused an uptick in suicidal behaviors, it did increase internet searches for suicide-related terms. Some experts have expressed concerns about the show's portrayal of sensitive topics, with some arguing that it does not accurately depict the complexities and nuances of mental health issues. A study in the Journal of American College Health found that college students who watched "13 Reasons Why" had a better understanding of suicide risk factors but not necessarily a greater awareness of their own suicidal ideation. Overall, research on "13 Reasons Why" suggests that while it may have sparked important conversations about mental health and suicide prevention, its portrayal of sensitive topics is a subject of debate among experts. Several studies have examined the relationship between Netflix's series 13 Reasons Why and suicide rates in the United States. A study published in the Journal of the American Academy of Child & Adolescent Psychiatry found a significant correlation between the show's release and an increase in suicidal thoughts among adolescents. The study's authors suggested that the show's portrayal of graphic content, including suicide, may have contributed to this increase. Other research has focused on the impact of 13 Reasons Why on mental health professionals and the general public. A study published in JAMA Psychiatry found that a significant number of people who searched for information about suicidal behaviors online after watching the show were not seeking help or support for themselves, but rather were trying to understand others' experiences. Additionally, researchers have investigated the use of crisis text lines following the release of 13 Reasons Why. A study published in Preventive Medicine Reports found that there was a significant increase in help-seeking behavior among youth who used these services after watching the show. Some studies have also explored the potential for media to influence public health responses to emerging crises like 13 Reasons Why. Researchers have argued that ignoring data and delaying reactions can exacerbate public health tragedies, highlighting the need for more timely and informed responses. Lastly, research has shown that there were reports of adolescent psychiatric outpatients on the impact of the TV series 13 Reasons Why. A qualitative study found that some adolescents reported feeling a sense of validation or understanding after watching the show, but also expressed concern about the potential for others to be influenced by its content in negative ways. Overall, these studies suggest that Netflix's series 13 Reasons Why has had a significant impact on public health and mental health professionals. Netflix series 13 Reasons Why faced criticism and controversy following its release. The show's graphic depiction of a teenager's suicide led to complaints from mental health experts and advocacy groups. In response, Netflix added advisory warnings to the show, but some critics felt that this was not enough to mitigate potential harm. The New Zealand government required parents to watch the series with their children due to concerns over its content. The show's rating in New Zealand was also changed to RP18, indicating a higher level of maturity and potentially disturbing content. Mental health experts expressed worries that 13 Reasons Why could trigger suicidal thoughts or behaviors in vulnerable viewers. Some organizations, such as Division 53 SCCAP, released statements criticizing the show's portrayal of mental illness and its potential impact on young audiences. Additionally, several news outlets and publications weighed in on the controversy surrounding 13 Reasons Why, with some arguing that the show was not an effective force for mental health awareness.
