The Harrison Lake region was, at the time, under the waters of Lake Erie. When Lake Erie decreases to its present size, the former area underwater reverts to a swampy area. The swamp (120 miles long and 30 to 40 miles wide) is known as the Great Black Swamp due to its soil color and dark shade under giant trees. Over the years, the swamp was an incredible deterrent to western settlements. Booking Reservations avoid the area, travel around the swamp through Lake Erie to reach southern Michigan. The Indian Ottawa settled just near the well-drained lands beside the Maumee River and its tributaries. The swamp is the last area to be completed in Ohio. It served as bookings for Native Americans until they were forced out in 1842. It was not until the development of ground drainage techniques in the 1850s that a large number of settlers moved here. Although today, northwest Ohio remains one of the most inhaled areas of the state, although it is one of Ohio's richest agricultural regions. In 1836, the U.S. Congress and the Ohio Legislature finally completed a 10-year quarrel with the state of Michigan about the location of the Ohio-Michigan border. For years, the two states claimed possession of an 11-mile-wide strip of land extended from the estuary of the Maumee River near Toledo to the Ohio border with Indiana. Today's Ohio-Michigan border is an agreed one in 1836. Congress siding with Michigan's claim that year, Harrison Lake State Park will be stationed in Michigan. In 1941, a dam above Mill Creek was completed and Lake Harrison was created. Lakes and surrounding areas were primarily maintained for hunting and fishing purposes until 1950 when Lake Harrison was established as a state park. Natural Features Area comprising The Harrison Lake State Park is at a time part of the vast wetlands. This mysterious area contains tower trees and soggy black soggy soils and is a haven for rattlesnake swamp (or massasauga, as it is also known). Very few remains have ever been large swamps, but the garden still harbours unique natural features associated with wetlands. Great blue herbs and common birds can be seen at the shallow west end of the lake. Many songbirds -- such as vesper sparrow, regular yellowthroat, and brown thrasher -- inhabit meadows and garden forests. Several species of reptiles and amfibia found the habitat of the park was suitable. Box turtles, painted turtles, garter snakes, green frogs, and american toads are found here. Small mammals such as red foxes, raccoons, skulls, and unusually provoked thirteen soil squirrels are often seen.
